Upsets in rugby, football

by Mike Guinlock

Upsets marked the Intramural rugby and flag football play-offs this past week. In rugby heavily-favoured PHE had a 3-0 lead going into the final two minutes of its game with Law '78 and had '78 pinned in its own end.

One long run later 4-3 in favour of '78. Commerce '79 and Education, two powerful teams, battled to a 0-0 tie through regulation time however, late in the second overtime period Education scored the winning tie. The other team in the rugby round-robin final is the underdog Commerce '77 squad.

In Flag Football quarter-final action a strong defence and powerful ground attack led underdog Mining to an 18-7 victory over Civil. Ian Berzins had one touchdown, threw a two-point conversion and kicked a twenty-five yard field goal. In the second game MBA struggled to a 7-0 victory over Law '78. Jack Muir audibled at the line on the very first offensive play of the game and threw the deciding touchdown pass, however the stars of the game were the MBA defence. They stopped '78 four times from inside the two-yard

In the third game of the evening PHE overpowered Arts '78 behind the throwing arm of Bruce McFarlane. Pentland and Ostrom scored the PHE touchdowns and their defence stopped the explosive ground game of '78 limiting Powell and Domarsky to less than 50 yds. In the biggest upset of the quarter finals Commerce '79 behind running back Don Cameron and quarterback Geoff Arnoldi crushed defending champions Arts '77 20-7. Cameron accumulated over 150 yards on the ground and Arnoldi threw for two touchdown passes. The important factor in the game lay in the fact the '79's offence kept the ball away from '77's offence. '77 quarterback John McDiarmid was 11 for 15 but this was too little, too late.

Queen's Men's and Women's Intercollegiate Springboard Divers will have their first taste of competition this Saturday in a triangular meet with Universities of Toronto and York. The Queen's divers are looking forward to their strongest showing ever with experience and depth on both teams.

The Queen's gals are led by Janet Nutter, former Pan American Games 10 metre Tower Champion, and 3 metre springboard champion in the Canada Summer Games at the Canadian Nationals. Janet is joined by Eve Wahn, formerly of the Saskatchewan Diving Club, who competed in the 1975 Canada Summer Games and Mary Ann Drinkwater who doubles as the Kingston Diving Club coach.

The men are led by former University of Toronto diver George Southey and Pittsburg, Pa. High School diver Randal Archer. They are joined by veterans Doug Buckingham and Fred Kallin.

The public is invited to watch the divers compete on the one- and three-metre boards from the Queen's Pool Gallery from 10:00-11:30 and 1:00 to 2:30 this Saturday, November 13. Running concurrently in the pool will be the annual Queen's Invitation Meet for Swimming Clubs between Toronto and Ottawa, starting at 1:00 p.m.

Volleyball teams see lots of action

by Dave Tod

Queen's Volleyball Gaels entered their second tournament of the season last weekend with optimism and enthusiasm. This was not enough however, to upset some of the polished, more experienced efforts of several university and club teams from around Ontario. Mental errors and a small number of fundamental mistakes led to inconsistency on the part of our squad. It should be noted though, that the team displayed a buoyant spirit and determined attitude that will enable them to battle their way to the top.

In the morning, Queen's was defeated by a vengeful University of Western Ontario group. The second match saw us lose a hard-fought decision to YMHA of Toronto. In the third and fourth encounters, Queen's split games against Onion Patch of Ottawa and Trois-Rivieres. As the day wore on it was apparent that the Gaels had their work cut out for them for the remainder of the season. They consider last weekend not as a setback but rather a realization of what it will take to develop their full potential.

This weekend November 13, Queen's opens its regular season with an OUA league tournament across town at RMC. The Gaels play Ryerson at 10:00 a.m., U. of T. at 1:00 p.m. and Laurentian at 2:30 p.m. From talking with the players, we can expect to see some real fireworks happen against these squads. Coach Huddleston has been drilling his players hard all this week in preparation for Saturday. Fan support has been good of late and of course there is no greater impetus to a team's performance than when it has the vocal and moral support of the student body.

I might add also, that the Women's Volleyball Team did very well this past weekend, winning five of eight matches. Apart from their good looks there is some real talent amongst them.

In summary, then, it is Queen's in league play at RMC this weekend. It promises to be good. If you can't be an athlete-be an athletic supporter. Don't miss it.

Grey Cup Westward bound

CAC's Corner

by Chris Chenoweth

It's playoff time in the C.F.L., and once again the Toronto Argonauts aren't in the running. It seems all the Argos can do consistently is finish last in the East on the final day of the football season. Toronto's inability to win is a tragedy, but not for the Boatmen, who deserve to lose merely by coach Russ Jackson's inability to utilize Heisman Trophy winner Anthony Davis properly. Instead the Argos' suffering hurts the Canadian Football League itself. You see, Toronto is hosting the Grey Cup this year, and capacity crowds always seem to fill the C.N.E. Stadium, win or lose. But imagine the extra revenues going to the C.F.L. gate equalization plan from Toronto if the Argos actually did win a playoff spot?

Of the three teams actually in Cup contention, none from the East should win. The first matchup between Hamilton and Montreal looks to be a good one. Hamilton features three former Allouettes of 1975 vintage who proved to be the top stars in Steeltown - quarterback Jimmy Jones, All-Star and leading ground gainer Jimmy Edwards, and All-Star cornerback Lewis Cook. The Allouettes offer three inconsistent players they preferred over those players traded off to Hamilton - injured and idiotic quarterback Sonny Wade, fumble prone Andy Hopkins, and injury prone Johnny Rodgers. The game should turn into a battle of scrambling quarterbacks Jones & rookie Joe Barnes, and feature a struggle between Rodgers and Edwards for the title of premier offensive star in the league. I'll take Rodgers over anybody, and Montreal by three points.

Ottawa and Montreal should be a toss-up, and the odds have to favour the Riders. Granted Ottawa choked at the season's end, but when the team has first place locked up by October, who needs to try Art Green alone has scored more TD's than virtually the entire Allouette offence, and that in itself should settle the question in Ottawa's favour. Ottawa by ten points.

In the classic Cup struggle of Riders, Saskatchewan will walk over anybody on the field. Ron Lancaster completed an amazing 60 percent of his passes, and threw for 27 touchdowns alone. His team lead the C.F.L. in both offence and defence, and looks as good as the old Ottawa team of 1968 Jackson-Tucker-Adkins vintage.

The Cup final is set for Nov. 28, and by a cold Monday morning Saskatchewan fans should be going wild in Regina.

A Peanut & Rangers mix?

by Michael Fitzgibbon

President-elect Jimmy Carter telephoned New York City mayor Abe Beame after his victory last Wednesday morning and pledged aid and support for the financially-plagued Big Apple. One has to wonder whether Carter's plans will include the city's troubled hockey team - the New York Rangers.

The Rangers are presently mired in the cellar of the NHL's Lester Patrick Division. Phil Esposito and company have managed to win 6 games, while dropping 7 and tying 2. They remain 1 point behind the improved Atlanta Flames, and trail the disorganized Philadelphia Flyers by 2 points. The ranger's bottom position is even harder to swallow when they glance up at the top spot where the 4-year old New York Islanders sit comfortably. The battle for hockey supremacy in New York has become a laugh, with the Rangers as the joke.

The 1976-77 season started out fine. Madison Square Garden's 17,500 partisan Ranger fans were greeted with the "new look" Rangers. The team had abandoned their traditional red, white and blue attire in favor of fancy blue and white uniforms. Some of the players even went so far as to change their numbers to 77, 88, and 00.

After 15 games, the Rangers fans are discovering that their "new look" rangers are still the "same old" team. The "Broadway Blueshirts" have a potent offence, but the defence and goaltending have been spotty. The team is making many mistakes, and is not hitting or hustling.

The "new look" Rangers are not the "same old" team player-wise. The team's famed goal game (GAG) line of Jean Ratelle, Rod Gilbert, and Vic Hadfield has been disassembled. Only Gilbert remains with the New York squad. Ratelle is having remarkable success in the black and gold Boston Uniform, while Hadfield is hobbling around Pittsburgh trying to shake off-season knee surgery.

In an effort to rejuvenate his team last year, ex-Ranger boss Emil "The Cat" Francis unloaded both his goalies. New York favorite Ed Giacomin is stopping pucks with the lowly Detroit Red Wings, while Gilles Villemure is collecting splinters on the Chicago Black Hawk bench. The Ranger brass also traded super defencemen Brad Park to the Bruins in exchange for Esposito and Carol Vadnais. Recently, the Rangers gave veteran blue-liner Gilles Marotte his walking papers.

The Broadway Blueshirts are having problems this year - a lot of them. Phil Esposito, the Rangers' gift

Field Hockey Gals fare well

by Carolyn Broadhurst

Two weekends ago at McMaster University, the Queen's Gals' Senior field hockey team wound up their seasonal play in the second part of the OWIAA round-robin finals. The players of this team include Donna Buchan, Sue Marshall, Lauren Gallagher, Gillian Young, Mary Brunton, Carolyn Broadhurst, Jane Wagenest, Anne McRinney, Jan Hazelwood, Bev Koskey, Janice Holder, and Pearl Dixon and is coached by Nanette Cuddy, a PHE student at Queen's.

The team fared well in this tournament by finishing with 2 wins, 1 tie and 1 loss. The Gals played against Waterloo on Saturday and beat them 1-0 thanks to a goal scored by rookie Jan Hazelwood. The afternoon game was played against McMaster. Pearl Dixon scored the opening goal while rookie Jane Wagenest scored the closing goal to end the game in a 2-2 tie. That night the annual closing banquet was held at 'Mac' for all senior and intermediate teams.

The Queen's Seniors had ample chance to show their hidden dramatic talents by presenting a skit called "Star Bright and the Seven Bullies," an adapted version of that well known fairy tale, "Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs." Special mention should be awarded to the lead actress, Janice Holders, who starred as Star Bright despite the prominent black eye which she received in the McMaster game.

The next day, the Queen's team continued their streak of good playing and defeated Western, 3-0. Goals were scored by Carolyn Broadhurst, Pearl Dixon and Jan Hazelwood. The last game was played against Guelph but despite a hard-fought battle it ended in a 1-0 loss against Queen's.

The results from this tournament were an improvement over Part I of the finals which had been played the preceding weekend at York U. Queen's faced the strong Eastern teams of Toronto, McGill and York during this tournament. Despite some challenging matches the Gals were unable to come up with a win.

The combined results of Part I and Part II placed Queen's in fifth spot out of a total of eight teams. This was an improvement over their seventh place finish in an exhibition tournament played at Waterloo early in October.

Congratulations should be given to Donna Buchan, Jan Hazelwood, Janice Holder and Carolyn Broadhurst who were all chosen to attend trials for the provincial squad.

As the field hockey season draws to a close for another year, sincere thanks is extended to manager Vicki Newbury for keeping everyone organized, Coach Cuddy for her dedicated efforts, and to everyone else for the endless good times.

from God" is not the same pain in the neck for rival goalies. Esposito has not fulfilled his leadership role, nor has he been scoring. The rugged center has poked in a meager 5 goals thus far.

Steve Vickers has been unable to get his act in gear. The talented left wing has scored only 5 goals and has been a big disappointment. Centers Pete Stelmowski and Walt Tkaczuk have scored a grand total of 3 goals between them. Ex-Pittsburgh Penguin, Greg Polis has tallied 4 times.

The Ranger retrenching is shared between John Davidson and W.H.A. cast off Gilles Gratton. Both goalies have been porous and inconsistent. The Broadway Blueshirts have allowed a skyrocketing 3.73 goals a game, the 6th worst in the NHL.

Another weak point is the defence. Carol Vadnais has had great difficulty in filling Brad Parks' skates, and has proven that he is only an average defenceman. Mike McEwen and Dave Farish are rookie blueliners, and their adjustment to the big-time has been surprisingly slow. Ron Greshner and Nick Beverley have had trouble controlling the puck inside the blue line.

There are some bright spots peeking from the Ranger line-up.

Levesque in Front

A Toronto Star copyright story reported that a new poll shows Quebecers favour the Parti Quebecois in the upcoming election. However, the same poll shows 58 percent of the voters oppose separatism. The results were obtained in a public opinion survey for The Star and three other news organizations.

The survey shows 29.5 percent for the P.Q., 15.9 percent for the Liberals, 30 percent undecided, 6 percent refusing to answer and 4.5 percent who say they will not vote. On the separatism question, 18 percent were in favour, 58 percent were opposed and 20 percent undecided. This is similar to poll findings in 1973.

The survey also showed dissatisfaction with the Liberal government with 26 percent being satisfied, 42 percent not too satisfied and 25 percent not at all satisfied. The polls were based on 1,097 telephone interviews and have a variation of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Hunger Strike

A hunger strike at Millhaven Institution which started last Friday threatens to continue longer than the seven days originally planned.

Approximately sixty-eight men are refusing to eat as a protest over the locking-up of some inmates twenty-four hours a day. This lock-up was a consequence of the October 5 uprising. Apparently some of the prisoners thus confined in their cells have not received fresh clothing for over a month. If there is no change in conditions they say they will continue the hunger strike, and some inmates threaten even to stop taking liquids. Medical tests are given daily to those fasting unless they refuse to be checked and weighed.

Unemployment Insurance

This year a trial system of report-in-person to pick up your unemployment insurance has been instituted in Kingston, Regina and Chicoutimi. All claimants who must be available for jobs and who do not live farther than ten miles out of town must come in every week to pick up their claim, which on the average amounts to eighty-five dollars. The program seems to be

Ships Seized

Three Cuban ships were seized and their captains arrested, after they were caught inside the 12-mile Canadian fishing limit on Monday. Charges of being inside the fishing limit without prior permission are being laid. Conviction on the charges could result in 2 years in jail, a fine of up to $25,000, or both.

The ships were first noticed on Canadian Forces radar early Monday morning. When a Department of Fisheries boat went out to investigate, one of the boats tried to make a run for it, but was unsuccessful. At first, the captains of the ships refused to head for Halifax, but agreed to it after fisheries officials threatened to put armed forces personnel aboard the Cuban vessels to force them in.

New SC Leader

Andre Fortin, a member of Parliament from rural Quebec, succeeded Real Caouette as leader of Social Credit Party of Canada on Sunday. Mr. Fortin defeated fellow saving money for the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Michael Hancock, the district manager for Kingston, said that unemployment insurance claims have been cut about twenty-five percent.

A detailed study will be made on this new system next month, but it does seem that this report-in-person system is preventing inertia setting in among people who claim the insurance over long periods of time. Other advantages to the system have to do with paperwork, which has been reduced, and with report cards, since cheating is harder now, and mistakes made filling out the cards are more easily detectable.

Rowhousing

City planning board members are feeling some alarm over the large increase of proposals to construct condominiums here in Kingston. One of the more serious problems connected with this type of rowhousing is the creation of a large number of private streets. Developers like to put in roads with only a fifty-foot road allowance, but city streets have a sixty-six foot road allowance. The city fears that one day it will be asked to take over the maintenance of these streets, which would prove awkward if they were built to these different standards. Ordinarily it is MP Rene Matte on the second ballot. Mr. Fortin was assistant to Mr. Caouette when he was leader, before being elected to the House of Commons in 1968. He was then appointed House Leader for the party.

As the new leader, Mr. Fortin follows the main party philosophy as developed by Mr. Caouette - federalist in tone and pursuing monetary reform. His platform proposed a revival of the Social Credit Party at the riding level across Canada. His chief opponent, Mr. Matte, was considered to be a crypto-separatist by many delegates. His campaign program proposed, among other things, a Canada restricted into a loose federation of five, semi-autonomous regions.

The outgoing leader, Real Caouette, was forced to retire due to his poor health. He watched the convention on television from an Ottawa hospital where he is recovering from a recent stroke.

Possible Boycott

Joseph Garba, External Affairs Minister of Nigeria, says that his country will seek a boycott of the 1978 Commonwealth Games to be held in Edmonton if any Canadian team participates in a sport with South Africa or if New Zealand doesn't stop her teams from playing there. Mr. Garba said in a news conference that he will attempt to organize a complete non-white boycott of the games. If he is successful only four countries, Canada, Britain, Australia and New Zealand will be participating.

Nigeria was a strong supporter of the boycott of the Montreal Olympic Games. That boycott was a result of New Zealand teams playing in South the condominium owners themselves who are responsible for the upkeep of their streets.

Last year planning board gave its approval to the construction of about 445 condominium units. Of present concern is the fact that most developers have built in the west end of the city, and this trend looks as if it will continue. Packing too many people into too little space warned Alderman Timmins, could result in problems such as were experienced in the north end of the city.

Ald. Keenleyside

Alderman Keenleyside, at one time considered as a strong potential candidate for the post of mayor, is stepping out of municipal politics. His name was often in the newspaper, and he had strong support in his ward.

He decided not to run for mayor since his job would have been impossible to fit around the schedule of a mayor. And the mayor's salary of $18,000 per year would not, according to Alderman Keenleyside, make the post feasible as a full-time job.

Alderman Keenleyside has been alderman in Rideau Ward for nine years, and has played a part in the restoration of the City Hall, in the expansion of the airport, in the

Canada's policy with respect to sports participating in South Africa is that teams or individuals may take part in sporting events there provided they do so without government support.

UN Backs Arms

The United Nations General Assembly endorsed armed struggle as a legitimate weapon in the hands of what it termed the oppressed people of South Africa. The endorsement came as part of a 10-point program designed to force an end to apartheid in South Africa.

The program was adopted by 108 votes to 11 with 22 members abstaining. Canada voted in favor of the resolutions dealing with the UN trust fund for South Africa, solidarity with South African prisoners, apartheid in sports and the broad outlines for a UN committee on apartheid. Canada rejected the rest of the motions because they embodied approaches in which there was deep division in the UN community.

Toronto Shrinking?

Poll on power

A Gallup poll on nuclear power in Canada, revealed that 41 percent of Canadians surveyed said that we should increase nuclear power, 20 percent thought we should not develop it any further and 14 percent felt we should stop it entirely. The rest were undecided.

Gov't control threatens education

by Jennifer Warren

Principal Watts has decried the "provincialization" of post-secondary education, which he intimated is largely a built-in consequence of the structure of the British North America Act (BNA). The Act assigns responsibility of education "in and for" the provinces, to the provinces themselves. In fact, under the existing fiscal arrangements agreement between the provinces and the Federal government, generally 50 percent of the cost of higher education is covered by the Federal government, but this goes directly to the provincial governments for allocation, to meet the conditions of the BNA Act. Principal Watts expressed a personal concern that such a situation generates a narrow provincial focus in our education system. This method of financial comes up for review in 1977. There is currently a Federal proposal to change the financial arrangement into a per-capita grant system to the provinces. Dr. Watts was fearful that this could consequentially create a tendency towards limited provincially based university entrance, resulting in a constructed exchange of ideas. The maintenance of a national outlook in universities is important, Principal Watts suggested, not only to enrich the exchange of ideas, but also to foster the unity of Canada.

Principal Watts was speaking at the third lecture in the Last Lecture Series, his theme being "the role of the university" in society, particularly topical because of the recent National Students Day.

Some people overrate universities and consider post secondary education a cure all for society's problems, whereas others are confused and disillusioned as to whether university is worth it at all, the lecturer said. He admitted that the administration must take some of the blame for the disillusionment since often the bureaucracy involved with problems such as "accessibility, flexibility and viability" as a means to an end, have tended to lose sight of the actual goals of university education namely the advancement and utilization of knowledge in and for society. Principal Watts also emphasized that the transmission of knowledge not only included information but also critical intellect and wisdom. Principal Watts recognized the legitimate accountability which must be afforded to the taxpayer and the government in light of the large proportion of university budgets which the government covers through the expenditure of public funds.

In relation to this, though, he identified the threat of increasing state control in education. "The most precious gifts which can accrue from a university must be given by free minds," the principal said, and therefore it was "in the interests of society itself that the university should be protected from political hocus-pocus." This dilemma between accountability on the one hand and avoidance of state control on the other, could be resolved, Principal Watts suggested, by a formula financing arrangement or through "buffer bodies" such as the Canada Council which could be effective in "keeping the bureaucrats and politicians at an arm's length away."

Tuition hikes cut by Davis report says

TORONTO (CUP): An unconfirmed report says Ontario Premier William Davis has yielded to political pressure and reduced the proposed Ontario tuition fee hike.

According to Claire Hoy, provincial government columnist for the Toronto Sun, Davis reconsidered the increase, and reduced the hike of $175 for university and $100 for community college students to $100 and $75 respectively.

The report said Davis made the suggestion to the provincial cabinet because he was "concerned about the political ramifications of large increases. The hike would mean a 29 percent jump in university tuition fees and a 40 percent increase for community college students."

A government official said the proposed educational budget would not be presented for another month. The minister would make no comment regarding the Sun story.

David Warner, the educational critic of Ontario's New Democratic Party hinted at the reason behind Davis's political manoeuvre. "There are over 130,000 students in post secondary institutions and except for 9,000, they are all eligible to vote," he said.

"The extra $175 might be passed on the parents and this could potentially affect over 300,000 adults. This spread out over 20 centres in Ontario would mean that in a lot of ridings voters would oppose the premier," Warner added.

Facing up to Quebec

The composition of the new Quebec National Assembly will have been determined by the time this edition is read. With the end of the campaign we will in all likelihood face a new Quebec — a new set of expressed priorities demanding different treatment from the remainder of Confederation.

Rene Levesque has focused the Parti Quebecois campaign upon the mismanagement and alleged corruption of the Liberal majority government. The fundamental PQ platform of separatism has been downplayed to a promise of a referendum on the issue within two years. In the interim, they say, the important issue is that a PQ choice would bring competence, sensitivity, and honesty to power.

Robert Bourassa's Liberals, having pursued a course of expanded political autonomy via Bill 22 has neither denied nor apologized for its past failures. In several variations on the theme "It has to be this way" they have sold themselves as the only alternative to a republican Quebec.

Recent polls show that responsible government means most to the populace. Though a majority of electors do not favour an independent Quebec, most might feel that it is worth risking separation to fell the Liberals.

Bourassa, his Liberal successor, or Levesque — whoever sits at the next federal-provincial conference is certain to demand a different reception from the rest of Canada. Each would speak for a Quebec that is increasingly less spooked by the prospect of its own independence. Levesque would bring to any negotiation the inevitability of his referendum on independence by 1978. Quebec would no longer be the 'spoiled' child keeping to herself in a corner. Rather she would be standing by the door and for the first time formally considering leaving. Such a dilemma would test the patriotism of all Canadians.

Abandonment of Quebec, Canada

For the "Bay Streeter" and Alberta rancher alike, the temptation to say "let them go if they don't like it" reflects an abandonment of more than Quebec, it is an abandonment of Canada. A separate Quebec, whether it might itself prove economically viable or not, would so isolate the Atlantic provinces as to cripple them economically. In this way the attitude on the part of some sectors of English speaking Canada implies a willingness to see the further disadvantage of the Maritime members of confederation.

How the rest of the country responds to Quebec reflects how we all perceive Canada. What is that perception? Are the provinces no more than trading partners? If we share cultural and social ideals (like bilingualism) how is it that we seem unable to understand each other? Perhaps it is because Canadians, close to the influence of the United States, have assimilated a concept of society oriented towards the individual. In such a society the individual lives merely to seek his own prosperity. Our choice is a commitment either to a society which values the individual or to a society which respects the whole community of interests that is Canada. The latter involves concessions on the part of all constituents.

The English must respect and accept the French fact in Canada, otherwise we have true grounds for our confederation? Our cultural differences and problems are surmountable. Many people in Quebec, and indeed in the rest of Canada disagree with this point of view. Has Quebec, though, the right to decide on this issue alone? We think not.

Quebec is an inherent and constitutional part of Canada; without Quebec Canada no longer exists. Canadians must defy any minority's right to unilaterally decide to secede from the whole. No modern Quebecois can claim the right to decide the fate of all Canadians both present and future. For example, it would be preposterous for Quebec to deny Maritimers any of their strength as Canadians.

If Quebec has the option of deciding her independence then she is allowed autonomous for only an autonomous state can make such a profound decision. Quebec alone should not have that option.

Professor forecasts Quebec vote, future

by Anne Johnson

"Certainly the Liberals are fighting for their political lives," commented Professor P. M. Leslie of the Queen's Political Studies Department in a recent interview with The Journal. When asked to make a last minute prediction on the outcome of last night's Quebec election, he was understandably hesitant, but noted that he would not be surprised if the Parti Quebecois won a majority government.

"What's surprising to me," he said, "is that the independence issue has been remarkably low in profile. The PQ especially has been down-playing the word 'separatism' in favour of the more vague term 'independence.' Leslie feels that this stance will be more likely to capture the support of the less radical elements in Quebec society. What Rene Levesque has had in mind is a political and cultural separation, retaining economic ties with the rest of Canada.

"It may be that the Liberals will be able to stamper the voters by stirring up a feeling of panic," said Leslie. During the campaign, the Liberal Party has been warning the voting public of the effects of a split vote in the anti-Parti Quebecois camp. They have virtually said that voting for any other party than the Liberals will be indirectly voting for the PQ. "What has also been surprising in this election campaign," said Leslie, "is the apparent concern of the Anglophone voters to these warnings." Many English ridings have been seen to lean toward the Union Nationale Party or the recently formed Democratic Alliance.

It is the English voters which would have more to worry about from the set of policies that the PQ could implement without passing any legislation. According to Leslie, Bill 22 would only have to be enforced more stringently in order to fulfill their campaign promise of the use of French as the "functional language of Quebec in all areas of activity." In effect, he said, the PQ would "simply pour the same policy into a different bottle."

Professor Leslie was asked to speculate on the effects of a PQ victory. "If it got into power," he said, "we would probably see a long period of negotiation with Ottawa, if indeed Ottawa would be willing to negotiate. Trudeau has consistently said nothing in this respect." What he could see happening, would be an increase in tension between the two levels of government. If coupled with a series of events demonstrating to the Quebec populace that negotiation with Ottawa is impossible, it may be enough to change the minds of those who are undecided over the independence question. The referendum outcome would then be a favourable one for the "Pequistes." (P.Q.).

Leslie feels that the best thing that could happen would be a Liberal minority victory along with the personal defeat of Bourassa.

About 300,000 Canadian students were reached by activities on National Student Day Nov. 9, according to student organizers of the nation-wide discussion on financial cutbacks and related problems facing post-secondary students. Out of 125 campuses in Canada, 75 participated actively and an additional 25 distributed National Student Day literature.

With the exception of the Sir George Williams campus of Concordia no Anglophone universities or CEGEPs in Quebec took part in National Student Day. The Francophone student organization, L'ANEQ is planning its own day on March 22 for the same purposes.

Only 10 percent of Canada's post-secondary students actively participated in National Student Day, but the rest were made aware of the issues facing them, which Ontario Federation of Students chairperson, Murray Miskin, said was the purpose of the day.

Oil used as weapon in first war

by Paul Henderson

Dr. Marion Kent dealt with oil as a weapon, in particular as used against Britain during World War I, in a lecture here Thursday.

Dr. Kent, professor of history at the University of New South Wales, prefaced her remarks by posing a number of general questions. What sort of political effects would the use of the oil weapon produce? How is it to be employed, directly or indirectly? Should it be used on its own or in conjunction with other measures? Finally how does it affect oil company-parent-host country relationships? Britain's situation in the First World War, Dr. Kent believes, is one of the earliest examples in which several of these questions first presented themselves.

Britain had to rely on oil imports from abroad and in particular from Persia, to meet its domestic demand. A secure supply in either war or peace was essential particularly for political-strategic reasons, namely to fuel the ships of its vast Navy. During World War I German U-boats were finding the tankers easy targets, and by 1916 Britain was beginning to experience a serious fuel problem. Here was Britain at the head of the greatest Empire known to man humbled because it lacked a definitive oil policy. It was possibly too much to expect that this situation could have been prevented, but the British government was determined never to be put in such a tenuous position again. Fortunately, the entry of the United States into the war relieved the pressure, but the British still sought to gain access to a secure supply of fuel, one preferably under its own control. This was most evident in the purchase of majority shares in the Anglo-Perian Oil Company. Dr. Kent attempted to put this in its proper perspective by pointing out that this was before nationalization had become government policy, and that in fact the company had begged the government to relieve it of its financial difficulties. This company was later to become the international conglomerate, British-Petroleum. Finally, during the later and post war years the government adopted various measures to tighten the obvious lack of a clearly defined administrative policy. A bureaucratic framework was essential to effectively implement even the most basic initiatives such as rationing.

Dr. Kent concluded that Britain's vulnerability to the use of oil as a weapon and the near success of its use forewarned of similar measure some sixty years later.

Oping is still dead here

by Debra Sigler

Despite the fact that Ontario Public Interest Research Group (Oping) is currently in operation at various universities across the province, Paul Steep, Vice President-Operations said recently that the AMS has no intention of reviving the issue here. At the OFS conference held at Queen's in September of last year, the York representative did his best to persuade his colleagues to join the then nascent organization.

The idea of a student funded public interest research group was introduced in Ontario by Ralph Nader in a speech given at Waterloo in 1972. Subsequently Ken Dryden conceived of a province-wide group, with University students' councils committing themselves to an amount of $5-$10 per student. Some of the money would be used for research into local business, with the rest being used for research on province-wide interests.

According to Paul Steep, the AMS executive met with Dryden last year to discuss proposals for an Oping group here. Peter Lane, last year's External Affairs Commissioner said that Oping organizers "wanted an aggressive advertising campaign", to create a positive response, if the proposal were to be part of the November 1975 referendum.

Oping never reached the referendum because the AMS executive felt Oping "would be funded by students but not oriented toward campus or student issues," said Lane. As well, Lane claimed that the group "was not democratic," for it gave the university "no control over who was hired or the type of research done." The final AMS concern was the "over 90 percent of the money would go to Oping and little would be locally spent." The AMS was concerned that "student government should be able to control money spent on student issues."

cabinet ministers Donald MacDonald and John Roberts, told student representatives on Parliament Hill, November 9.

At many campuses National Student Day was the springboard for action on current issues. For example, committees were set up at Brock on accessibility, cutbacks and international students' problems.

Because cutbacks affect students as much as workers, the Canadian Labour Congress extended its full support for NSD.

"The labour movement is vitally concerned in the future of education in Canada and will fully cooperate with students in trying to improve the situation," said CLC president Joe Morris.

Although turnout in many places was low, this was the first time student unions held a national campaign and they are learning from their mistakes, according to National Union of Students executive secretary Dan O'Connor, who announced the NUS leadership would be meeting November 27 to plan further action.

Member of The Principal's Selection Committee, 1975
Delegate To The Second Biennial Conference, 1975
Don, Jeanne Mance Residence, 1976-1977

The official duties of the Rector, as defined by the constitution of the Alma Mater Society (By-Law No. 17, Section 1.),

"The Rector shall be the students' representative to the Board of Trustees"

The Rector, along with the Principal and the Chancellor of the university, sits as an 'ex officio' member of the Board. The Board of Trustees, it should be explained,

...is the legal owners of all Queen's property, its buildings and its assets. Their authority extends from the approval (or vetoing) of new buildings, expansion projects and property purchases to rubber stamping certain academic decisions, such as teaching appointments. (Who's Where; p. 50)

As the students' representative, the Rector is thus associated with all university bodies from the Senate to the Faculty Societies, but is partial to none. In essence, he is an Ombudsman. The Rector is also required to act in a ceremonial capacity.

As abstract as the above definition is, it stops there. And quite rightly. For it is the elected individual who defines the position of Rector by his very actions, by his very presence. He makes it what it is and what it is going to be. He should be "Deferential, glad to be of use. Polite; cautious and meticulous". He should also be "An attendant lord, one that will do: To swell a progress; start a scene or two". But more importantly, he should explore and develop the potential of the office. He should discover and use his finds for benefit of all students. For too long the position has been that of the vacillating functionary. Now is the time for advancement.

I stress immediacy and imagination, enthusiasm and energy. The office of Rector is not confined to four walls and a telephone. His office is where he is, whether that be on the steps of the library, or in cafeteria. But his approachability should only be surpassed by concern,

Morris Chochla

Rector Candidate

The Rector historically has had three main functions to perform; namely 1) student voice on the Board of Trustees, 2) student figurehead at all ceremonial functions and 3) administrative ombudsman between students and university administration. To these I would add a fourth which is: to act as a resource person in matters relating to the university for all student groups and as a communicative channel between student groups and the administration.

In order to perform these functions, the Rector must have a thorough working knowledge of 1) the governmental and administrative structure at Queen's and 2) the concerns and problems of students. Only with constant involvement and participation can the Rector maintain a sufficient grasp of the concerns and present them in an effective manner and with a broad base of support. Credibility is a must!

My past involvement with the AMS, the Senate, Senate Committees, Residences, Faculty Boards and student societies has provided me with the perspective and scope necessary to carry out the role of Rector at Queen's.

It must be emphasized that the Rector has no official connections with the university administration. The effectiveness of the position is based entirely on the ability of the Rector to represent student concerns to the Board of Trustees and in an informal sense to the administration of the university. This autonomous position allows the Rector to represent students in a sincere and objective manner.

and the Rector must concern himself not just with the well-being of the students, but with the welfare of the faculty and the maintenance staff as well. The Rector's constituency is Queen's and nothing less. Energy must spark his directives. For only the versatile and the enthusiastic have the impetus necessary to drive (or deliver) a message. He must make himself heard, so as to articulate the needs of his constituents.

But the Rector, must have more than his own abilities and attributes. If he is to be successful, he needs the respect of the Board of Trustees. It is therefore of the utmost importance that the candidate chosen receive strong support from the student body, now and later.

When voting tomorrow and on Thursday, think for a moment before casting your ballot. Consider the next three years, and the significance of your decision. You are Queen's. You make it happen.

an opportunity to re-evaluate our goals, and priorities in a critical manner. This evaluation is in a sense, forced upon us by financial constraint, and as such, the decrease in real resources may be a "blessing in disguise." We must continually seek ways to better utilize the resources we have available. No one will argue that our primary resources are the students and staff. Accepting this, surely much priority must be put up the development of the teaching and learning process. It is only through the effective utilization of people that we can develop a truly educated graduate within Queen's.

I hope that you will consider my views on the role of the Rector and that you share some of my concerns. Please make a wise choice and vote on Nov. 17-18.

Interview with Kit Spence - mayoralty candidate

Downtown is "key to Kingston's character"

Christopher "Kit" Spence, twenty-two, is a fourth year honours student of political studies at Queen's. A native of Yellowknife, Northwest Territories, he has been a resident of Kingston for the past five years while attending Queen's. Mr. Spence supports his university education by working as an underground miner for Giant Mines in Yellowknife. His political involvement to date has included working on a number of federal and provincial campaigns, including the provincial election campaign of Ken Keyes, one of his opponents in this year's mayoral election.

Mr. Spence has located his campaign headquarters in the old Benvenuto's Pizzeria at the corner of Division and Garret Street. From there he and his workers will conduct a campaign designed to reach the inhabitants of downtown Kingston, the people which Mr. Spence feels will be the key to the whole election.

Q.) What prompted you to run for Mayor of Kingston?
A.) I guess I'm just tired of students sitting around and complaining about life in Kingston. These people feel that there is nothing a student can do. I disagree. Despite restrictions of money and experience, students can become involved if they are aware of the issues.
Q.) Why didn't you run for alderman which isn't quite so demanding a position as Mayor, and where your chances of election might be greater?
A.) An alderman can't be as effective as Mayor in changing the existing problems in Kingston.
Q.) Do you feel that your chances for election are hurt by the fact that you are a student?
A.) I am aware of the strained relations between the students at Queen's and the residents of Kingston. I'm sure my chances will be hurt by the fact that I am a student. However, I am a student of Kingston: I have worked as a miner. The fact that I am a student in political studies will help me turn the theoretical into the practical. I can apply my studies to the present situations as they exist in Kingston.

Q.) With no background in the area of local or municipal government, don't you feel that you would be at a disadvantage in dealing with appointed officials and the extensive bureaucracy within Kingston City Council?
A.) I regard my inexperience in municipal affairs as an asset insofar as my past is unencumbered by obligations and debts. I am sure it will take time for me to become accustomed to the bureaucratic network. I do not know all the people, or the set-up, but I'm sure I could establish a working government before long.

Q.) How do you think the older members of the council would react to you as Mayor?

A.) There is an established elite in the political decision-making body in Kingston. If I was elected, I'm sure I would have problems with the older aldermen. They would question my ideas as emanating from an inexperienced young man.

Q.) What would be your main objective as Mayor?

A.) My main issue is inefficiency in the Planning Board. Kingston has lacked a long-term, cohesive plan for development. There has been little cooperation between the city of Kingston and Kingston townships in regard to planning. I would rectify the problem by enforcing legislation which would require builders, developers, etc., to put up bonds to ensure development is carried out. If a company defaulted on a project, then they would lose the bond.

Q.) If you are elected Mayor, you will automatically become Chairman of the Finance and Accounts Committee. What objectives do you have in relation to finances?

A.) My main objective in relation to Finance and Accounts is to tighten up the slack in spending. I would try to keep the tax rate down by spreading out large expenses through debentures rather than immediate payment out of current revenue. In regard to city spending, I guess you might call me a budget hawk. I'm not opposed to spending money, I'm opposed to bureaucratic inefficiencies and duplication of services which wastes money.

Q.) You have stated that your campaign will concentrate on the downtown areas of Kingston. Why?

A.) The people that live downtown, especially those in St. Lawrence ward are the people who have been overlooked. They need to be encouraged. I intend to restore people's confidence in the police of Kingston. By supplying this support, I hope to bring down the increase in petty crimes in the downtown area. The downtown area is the key to Kingston's character.

Q.) What are you doing for campaign funds?

A.) I received money from the AMS Outer Council. I'm also asking people, especially students, to contribute whatever they can.

Q.) What do you propose to do in relation to the improving liaison between Queen's and Kingston?

A.) Queen's University and the City of Kingston need to cooperate and coordinate their policies. Issues such as transportation and housing which directly relate to students will be among my priorities. These issues are only part of the problems between the two forces. The residents of Kingston must realize that the University is a major employer in Kingston and that the students inject a considerable amount of money into the economic system. On the other hand the students must show an interest and a pride in Kingston. Kingston is a nice place to live, and it could be better.

Resources: Weekend University Seminar discusses management and growth

"I have become conscious that there are certain problems right on our doorstep and most of those regard growth. It is these problems that we will be looking over the next day and a half." Thus began the second of the "Weekend University Seminars" this year at the Donald Gordon Centre for Continuing Education. The topic for the last weekend's group was "Canada's Resources: Mineral, Land, Air and Water."

In introducing the topic Dr. R. A. Price of Queen's Department of Geological Sciences, presented several slides to illustrate his contention that "The situation of plenty which we see before us is ephemeral in nature and we are faced by change which may either be catastrophic or gradual." The Earth, Dr. Price pointed out, "is a living organism which requires things to sustain its life. These things are its resources." Material is circulated through the earth as through an organism and the earth is "a whole series of interrelated systems driven partly by solar power and partly by the heat of the earth itself."

"Until recent phases of the earth's existence we had a stable equilibrium of production and use." In the past few centuries, however, man has become a factor of instability in the system due to his rapidly increasing use of resources. World population, consumption of minerals, use of fossil fuels are all growing at a tremendous rate. "If you take these observations you reach the inevitable conclusion that if things grow at a fixed rate then over a period of time you will run out," Dr. Price feels this time is rapidly approaching.

The change to rapid consumption began with the Industrial Revolution. This consumption has "abnormally affected" the state of equilibrium which existed for most of earth's history. Price presented an illustration of his thoughts through the use of a clock. If "you take one minute as equalling one year and place yourself at midnight on December 31, 1975, then the earth came into being in 1827. The first mammals did not appear until 1967 or 68 and the first recognizable human species did not arrive until November 26, 1975. Stone tools were developed around December 15th and agriculture started around 9:30 tonight. Water power was first used some 33 minutes ago, the radio about 55 seconds ago and the development of nuclear power has been within the last 12 seconds." This means that of the roughly 158 "years" of the earth's existence man has been consuming resources rapidly for around four minutes and already some of these resources are close to depletion.

In the discussion which followed Price's introduction Dr. G. K. Rutherford (Department of Geography) pointed out that the "use of copper is very recent and already we're close to using up all available ore bodies" in just under 105 years.

Solutions to the problems may be deeper than simple "resource management." Dr. E. D. Ongley (Department of Geography) observed that the problem lies in "the Christian ethic of progress and utilization of resources. Therefore talk of use of diminishing resources will involve the re-thinking of the Western ethic." Price concluded "the recycling and substitution of one mineral for another is nothing but a stop-gap. The real governing factor is the Earth's ability to reproduce these resources."

Tous dans L' même bateau

Par Cano

Oui, c'est vrai, le groupe que vous avez entendu des remeurs à propos émet leur premier microsillon, qui a été enregistré le 2 août au 21 août, 1976, au studio Son Québec.

Pour ceux qui ne sont pas familiarisés avec CANO (je vous lis le carton du disque), c'est la Coopérative des Artistes du Nouvel-Ontario. En 1971, un groupe de jeunes artistes franco-ontariens se réunissent pour former une société de création artistique. Ils se rencontrent autour d'une nouvelle vision, d'une identité franco-ontarienne et d'un désir de rebâtir leur coin du monde. Il n'y a pas de structure légale il y a tout simplement une "feeling" collectif et un désir d'expression. Oes ce moment on en voit de toutes les couleurs: Une troupe de théâtre, des auteurs, des poètes, des compositeurs, des musiciens, des photographes, des potiers, des artisans de cuir, des éditeurs et une ferme de 320 acres ou on élève maintenant des beaux gros bisons. Oes gens sont venus de partout pour y participer: de Sturgeon Falls, de Marlart, de Sudbury, d'Ottawa, d'Earlton, de Hull, de Montréal et de l'Acadie. Aujourd'hui, la compagnie musicale CANO est un aboutissement à toute cette évolution. C'est la plus récente branche de l'arbre CANO. Les membres ont pris trois ans pour se trouver. Le groupe s'est formé officiellement et a joué pour la première fois en décembre, 1975.

Le groupe CANO c'est: Marcel Aymar (voix, guitar sèche, cymbales turques), David Burt (guitare électrique, harmonica), Michel Osati (batterie et percussion), John Doerr (basse électrique, trombone, synthésiseur, piano électrique), Michel Kendel (piano électrique, basse électrique), Wasyl Kohut (violin, mandoline et Goëlands), Rachel Paiement (voix, guitare sèche percussion) André Paiement (voix, guitare sèche, flûte à bec), Michael Gallagher (son et direction artistique), Gary McGroarty (son et administration) Mark Oelorme (éclairage), Réjean Grenier (relations publiques) Robert Dickson (cuisinier-poète et directeur spirituel); plusieurs identités de milieux et de cultures différentes: franco-ontariens, acadiens, anglo-ontariens, ukrainiens.

La musique est la langue commune. La poésie des chansons est la langue de l'individu. Nous souhaitons d'être plus PRO ce que nous sommes qu'ANTI ce que nous ne sommes pas.

Le disque dont il s'agit est "Tout dans l'même bateau". C'est une collection de chansons bien arrangée et dépourvu d'hermétiques. Les chansons nous appellent à ôter notre "masque de maussaderie", de faire face au soleil et de laisser les ombres tomber derrière soi. C'est en fait une célébration philantropique et pastorale. C'est un disque qui vaut bien la peine d'acheter et qui sera complémentaire à collection du discophile de musique canadienne-française.

"From N. Y. to L. A."

Ca m'tanne...

Depuis quelques temps, il y a quelque chose qui me tanne. C'est, c'est %&! chanson (oops, il ne faut pas sacrer), c'est cette chanson "From N.Y. to L.A.", par Mlle. Gallant qui nous bombardent les oreilles jours et nuits. Mlle. Patsy Gallant a adapté la plus illustre chanson de Gilles Vigneault, "Mon pays", pour en faire la plus grosse quêtainerie musicale de l'année.

Les Anglais du pays connaissent déjà la mélodie de "Mon pays" puisque Radio Canada et la C.B.C. l'utilisent comme chanson thème de plusieurs émissions. Ils connaissent aussi le titre "Mon pays" et pensent qu'il devrait s'agir d'un éloge à la nation de "la mare usque ad mare". Il y a des personnes qui essaient d'expliquer d'un pays en évolution (jardin, chemin, feu, amis, chanson) retenu dans un "hiver" et une "plaine" sans issu. Quelques péquistes disent que cette chanson leur appartiennent tandis que les fédéralistes disent... Mais pour celui qui connaît l'oeuvre poétique, de Gilles Vigneault, il est évident que l'auteur s'ennuie d'un pays qui n'est pas un pays français, canadien, ou québécois.

Ce n'est pas tellement la musique comme telle qui me dérange, mais c'est plutôt la fausse traduction des lyrics (from N.Y. to L.A.) qui m'énrage. Mlle. Gallant est à la recherche de son "homme" et de "cheap thrills", DANS THE CITY LIGHTS FROM N.Y. TO L.A. Quelle histoire édifiante, n'est-ce pas?

Je n'aime pas voir Vigneault transformé en un "groupie" gigotant sous les néons de N.Y. et L.A. Une traduction rock en anglais fidèle au texte du troubadour de Natashquan, aurait encore plus de succès que cette bâtarde et niasserie actuelle de Gallant.

L'ANEQ trop gauche?

C'est pas une bonne année pour nos étudiants marxistes-léninistes. Après la purge des écrivains marxistes à Waterloo et la souillure de l'écusson sur trottoir de Queen's Socialist Coalition, nous venons d'apprendre que l'Association National des Etudiants du Québec (équivalent à notre OFS en Ontario) c'est débarassé des marxistes - léninistes au Congrès National de L'ANEQ. Ceci a eu lieu en octobre, au Congrès National de L'ANEQ à Hull. La lutte du pouvoir a occupé la majorité du temps des délégués des 25 universités et cégeps de la province qui ont abordés sur le sujet de bourses et prêts, l'autorité étudiante dans le domaine des services et organisations étudiantes, et le rapport GTX qui appelle pour des changements dans le système des cégeps au Québec.

For a little piece of the pie

by Sheilagh Dunn

I don't know about the rest of the population, but I am beginning to find the incrementalist approach of government very annoying and frustrating. Many policies are the result of cautious steps dealing bit by bit with the problem in question. This approach neglects and actually militates against the articulation of a fundamental principle which guides the policy. On the other hand, policies may be presented prematurely in order to head off public pressure. These plans may need revision after their implementation. An expectation of this may cause a lack of response to the policy and inhibit its effectiveness.

The icing on the cake was the further revival of core curriculum for Ontario high schools students announced by Education Minister Tom Wells. The curriculum, presented Oct 6, will not be in effect for students this year. Such an admission points out the inadequate planning of the policy. It was presented hastily in order to beat the Liberals to the punch. Should this attitude govern the policy-making of such an important area as education?

Much time and money is spent on studies, both in the private and public sector. Transportation, bilingualism, ethnic problems, small business - all aspects of government are the point of a study at one time. But I wonder how many of these proposals are seriously considered. Are they rejected out of hand as being not in tune with the political environment? Are they pushed aside to deal with more "pressing" problems? But usually these "pressing" problems are judged to be so because a government's mandate is in jeopardy. It is this attitude that prevents policies, deemed urgent by the people concerned, from being considered.

Government is subject to a barrage of pressure from groups concerned with a particular issue. These groups represent people directly involved, by virtue of their jobs, residences or genuine interest. To what extent does a government listen and act upon proposals for reform presented in this manner? The People or Planes groups succeeded in stalling the building of the Pickering airport - but for how long? On various occasions, a proposal may be picked up by the government but watered down so much as to render it ineffective and almost insulting.

This ad hoc tactic prevents the formulation of an overarching, comprehensive approach of a government to all aspects under its jurisdiction. At least the socialists have a definite, predictable attitude towards society in general. The welfare state and individualism, private industry and state control - a little bit of both in Canada makes government impossible to pin down.

Perhaps this governmental incrementalism is an outgrowth of democratic consensus - giving everyone a little piece of the pie. But it is frustrating to see, for example, the cultural community sacrificed at the expense of appeasing the business community or having valuable policies rejected because of political expediency.

The government, when questioned about the scheme, have justified it by stating they are only doing what other countries, Britain and the U.S. for example, are doing. Both these countries have differential fees, but in both instances the circumstances are significantly different. In Britain tuition fees for universities are non-existent, it's free, and the 'extra' fees which are charged are very low, certainly not of the magnitude of the Ontario fee. And in the U.S. higher fees are not charged to people who are from out of the country, but rather to those who are from out of state. Someone from New York pays the same to get into UCLA that someone from Canada does, so it's a little different. As far as these two countries being 'examples' of differential fees, they also happen to be the only countries in the western world to charge differential fees dependent on where you come from.

There are two points which when made should convince you of the basic injustice of this policy. Until very recent years the net flow of university students across the Canadian border has been an outflow. We have sent more Canadian students out to foreign institutions to

by Gerry Lewarne

Eclectic is a dirty word

This is an open letter to the Deans of the major undergraduate faculties. Gentlemen, you have taken the concept of a university education and twisted it in such a manner so as to most please the people who give you money.

"The real University is a state of mind. It is that great heritage of rational thought that has been brought down to us through the centuries." (Robert M. Pirsig). Rational thought, gentlemen, is an idea which, though chased by many students is rarely grasped. The reason for this, I believe, is the increase in specialization apparent in almost every department of every faculty at Queen's.

Students are taught to be objective and are never challenged when their objectivity matches that of the professor. Yet, I believe I am on firm ground when I say that objective thought is almost impossible. Since it is impossible, why is it not admitted? Why do the students have to coax a professor to talk about his personal opinion on almost any issue? The reason is really quite simple. The course structure, the course content and the course teacher are products of our system and they depend upon our system for their livelihood.

The course teacher is the easiest target for a student dissatisfied with his education. When the professor makes a subjective statement it can be refuted in logical argument by the presentation of facts which the professor had not broached in class.

The course content is more difficult to challenge. In some cases, a course can be changed by the students in the course. In most cases, because of student ignorance or departmental edict, it cannot be changed. The course structure is almost impossible to change. Clearly, if we can alter the course structure, the other two components will alter also.

One way to upgrade the educative value of Queen's University Inc. is to begin to emphasize interdisciplinary degrees. Through rational thought, one begins to wonder why engineers are not required to take some courses in the social and environmental impacts of the different projects in which they will have a hand when working after graduation. In their four years at Queen's, engineers are allowed to take two "liberal arts" courses. Is that not illogical if you believe that university will better equip the student in his life?

The business school is not much better. The students have one choice in their first two years. Everything else is required. In third and fourth year, the choices for the Commerce student are opened up but a Commerce student cannot take any more than one introductory course per year. So much for eclecticism in Commerce.

Engineering and Commerce do have one redeeming feature. Both hit you over the head with their narrow stream of courses right away. A student in those faculties knows in first year that his must conform to the peculiar brand of objectivity that his faculty preaches.

The Arts and Science faculty is different; they are sneaky. They say "Isn't it wonderful that you have 9 of 19 courses for options?" What is forgotten however is that for the average student about 6 of the 9 options are used up in the first two years.

With all due respect to first and second students, it isn't until half way through 2nd year that you find out where the good courses are. Consequently the third and fourth year students are faced with the choice between taking courses for interest or taking courses which will assist the student in his major.

An easy and simple way to get around the problem is to allow students to take a limited number of credits for their major from outside that department. When I suggested this to one of my professors, he answered, "Well, then you are changing the whole conception of a liberal arts education at this university." That is absolutely correct. If the educational structure isn't changed, eclectic remains a dirty word. That, my friends, is wrong.

be trained and return with their skills with university education as a form of foreign aid. One of the most beneficial services Canada, as a long time our university system was developing and we did not have sufficient variety of programs necessary for all our students. The universities of the world were open to us so that we might take advantage of them while our own system grew. And take advantage of it we did. But now that the tables have turned and we do have a fairly extensive university system, we want to turn around and say "well, we've got what we can out of those guys now, so let's up our fees and make some money off them." Hardly what I would call fulfilling our very real obligation to pass on the education we gained from others.

The last point I wish to make deals with the countries that helped us when we needed it and those that need our help now is worth saving 0.1 percent of the budget of the Ministry of Colleges and Universities. Vote no to differential fees for foreign students.

Corporations should support us

Dear Editor:

On Wednesday and Thursday of this week an opinion poll will be run simultaneously with the Rector election. Students will be asked for their opinion on the following question, "Do you support the principle of free tuition?" Since this is not unfortunately, a referendum question, the results of the poll will not be binding.

Simply stated, the "principle" of free tuition is this: that post-secondary education is a right, not a privilege, and that as such the cost of that education should be borne by the state, in much the same manner as the state assumes the responsibility for providing primary and secondary education. Currently most of the costs for educating a University student are borne by the Federal and Provincial government. Tuition fees only account for about one-third of the cost incurred in educating a student. Clearly if a policy of free tuition was ever instituted, additional revenues would have to be found to supplement the portion now paid by the student. Most advocates of this policy would suggest that the corporate sector has not contributed to the educational system through their taxes in proportion to the benefits they reap from it. Few people would argue that the modern corporation could survive without the highly trained administrators, engineers, lawyers, accountants, etc. that receive their training in the University system. It seems logical and fair that given this state of affairs the corporate sector ought to be required to support post-secondary education to a greater extent than it presently does or has done in the past.

The alternative to a policy of free tuition is a system whereby the student contributes directly to the cost of educating him/herself. This is the present situation. To a student who is already here at University this type of an arrangement is likely to appear fair. However there are many potential students who aren't here and aren't here for a simple reason: it costs too much. It is in this regard that a policy of free tuition would be most worthwhile. The Government of Ontario is pledged to a policy of universal accessibility to post-secondary education, yet so long as tuition fees are in effect there will always be financial barriers that will prevent real universal accessibility from existing. They are effectively removed when fees are removed.

Critics of free tuition will either refute the existence of financial barriers or claim that they can be overcome by using other programs, for example, loan programs like OSAP (Ontario Student Aid Program). In any loan program though there exists a fundamental inequality. Towards 2000, the report on post-secondary education prepared by the Committee of Presidents of Universities of Ontario point their inquiry out: They state; that with loan schemes "the indebtedness could be enormous - so high that it could never be anything resembling an incentive for low income groups; and beyond that, a fundamental ethical principle would be violated. What is unfair about the proposal is that only the lower income groups would have to accept the penalty of debt... There is a very real cost to being in debt, and it is difficult to see how the principle of equity is served by requiring some to incur debts and others not."

In effect then, loan schemes are an adequate means of insuring universal access to post-secondary education. In fact they are a disincentive to the low socio-economic groups they were intended to aid in the first place. As in so many social welfare programmes, it is always tempting to desire a selective program that serves those who demonstrate a need for aid. But in other government programs, notably OHIP and the Canada Pension Plan governments have recognized the necessity of instituting universality if the program is to serve those it was intended to reach. It seems odd that having accepted the need for universality in health care and pension plans they have rejected it for education. Free tuition, since it is a universal program will correct the inequalities that are inherent in a loan or grant program which is selective.

Those who are critical of free tuition, point to social factors, rather than economic factors as the real barrier to higher education. Free tuition is a financial solution intended to breakdown financial barriers. It does not address itself to social barriers to access or does it deny that they exist. It is unfair to attack on this basis. Free tuition is a policy that will solve financial, not social problems. The need for this type of program can be demonstrated: Towards 2000 states,

"University education, largely publicly financed, is already thought to discriminate in favour of the upper and middle class income groups... and on that basis the report proceeds to outline a number of alternatives to rectify this problem. To say there are other social barriers to accessibility does not deny that there is an admitted financial barrier to accessibility or that free tuition is a solution. Accepting the principle of free tuition means accepting the value inherent in a post-secondary education. This value cannot always be measured in quantitative terms, or for example, productivity can be measured in industry. It means accepting the premise that society, as well as the individual benefits from a well-educated population. More importantly it is fundamental to a democratic society that equal opportunities exist for all members of that society. Surely this includes equal access to education and this is the primary aim of free tuition."

respectability is like despising a great work of art BECAUSE it is Great. Is it best to build foundations on fads of the day so you can bend with the breeze? Or is it preferable to build something more solid, something that will weather the storm? If so, virtue and respectability are materials to use. These materials are invariably harder to work with, but the foundation will be firm.

And yes you may renovate a building over time but if you level the foundation you no longer have the same structure. And if you have a choice of building material, the question is, how long do you want your structure to stand?

"What are your values?"

Dear Editor:

"What year is this?" 1976 Mr. Smith. The time of the century is not the question. Rather, what are your values? Your values are distinct from your neighbors' and from the general consensus. Your values are your foundation, you must be able to stand on them. If you can not separate them from the milieu you are headed for a fall.

Recommending an acceptance of what society condones or thinks is right is saying that as an individual you really can not think for yourself. But thought is an individual process, there is no such thing as a communal brain, such thing as a communal values. There are no such things as communal values.

Enforced virginity is replaced by enforced promiscuity

Dear Editor:

Once again, Howard Smith exposes himself. Under the guise of a standard bearer furiously waving the Women's Liberation flag, he staunchly upholds the chauvinistic tradition. Oh he's subversive all right but we have spotted him.

In his last article, Virginity's a Social Disease, he presents the argument that in the year 1976 any woman abstaining from sex when her male counterpart is, in contrast having a wonderful time, is an anachronistic fool. He then paints a Utopia picture of males and females joyfully exploring the horizons filled presumably with an infinite variety of beds. On first glance this hypothesis may appear liberally slanted towards breaking the restrictive "virgin" stereotype. Granted this point is partially valid. Women must have the burden of social guilt lifted that in the past, being a "used model" entailed. But what alternative does Howard give us?

First, this enlightening statement from his article should be taken into account: "How many people you've screwed just like how many people you've kissed or eaten hamburgers with is immaterial to the question of marital worth."

To me, a person who puts sex on the same level as hamburgers is immediately suspect. Also, the act of sex is referred to in such terms as

"making it", "premarital sex experiences", "slept with", and "screwed". He very carefully avoids the expression "making love". Why? - because "making love" refers to an act of sharing that necessitates a growth in trust between two people. This means leaving oneself dangerously vulnerable.

No, Howard would rather we follow the safe path where "love making" degenerates to a bed count. This is not a better world of equal, trusting persons. It is nothing but a further manifestation of the old, male oriented, competitive society. As I see it, this results in a further alienation between men and women. Rather than giving a liberated perspective to life the element of choice is still non-existent. Enforced virginity is replaced by enforced promiscuity. With this policy, male and female advocate a form of non-professional prostitution.

Obviously, Howard Smith is not the new Messiah. Indeed, he is the very "ancient male chauvinist drummer" (disguised in a pseudo-liberation form) that he warns against. In conclusion, this would be totally demoralizing, not to mention depressing, if the fact did not exist that most men have grown beyond that adolescent concept of a sexual "free-for-all".

Political apathy helps status quo

Dear Editor,

I would like to take issue with Mr. Edmond David's analysis of the relationship between universities and political awareness or interest (re: Queen's should be an apolitical university November 12).

Mr. David uses the term "apolitical university" without ever clearly establishing what exactly he means by such a term. A university could be said to be apolitical, in one sense, if it takes no "official" political position or represents no established political ideology or party line. Consequently, those employed in the university are neither hired or forced to resign because of their political persuasions. In this sense the university encourages and institutionalizes political diversity and debate since various opinions, often in direct conflict, will be held. In this sense Queen's is, by and large, an "apolitical university" - that is it does not institutionalize any particular political ideology (except in the Commerce Faculty and perhaps in the Economics Department where a particular political-economic ideology is uncritically assumed). Where the university is not committed institutionally to a particular ideology open dialogue and political interest is available to all members of the university community.

However, Mr. David does not use "apolitical" in this more narrow sense. He means by "apolitical" an aversion or lack of involvement in political affairs, a disinterest in politics. He means, to use his own term, "political apathy." It is important to note that a university can be "apolitical" in the more narrow sense and be in complete opposition to "political apathy". Indeed it is essential a university condemn and oppose political apathy. It is the crucial function of the university to generate critical reflection and create an interest in all the important affairs our society must consider. Mr. David is familiar with Aristotle but sadly he is obviously not familiar with his philosophy. Aristotle, arguably more than any other philosopher, stressed the significance of political organization in society. He argued that constant political interest, reflection, and criticism is essential to an intelligent society and individual.

Political apathy is the most fatal blow that can be dealt to a democratic society. If political apathy predominates there will be no concern for political affairs. There will be no criticism of injustice or stupidity in the political order. More specifically there would be no issues, no voters, no candidates - in short there would be an authoritarian administrative regime. Where political apathy predominates freedom and intelligent government will quickly perish.

Mr. David cites two "extremes" where he claims politics has interfered with university life. First, he cites Romania where university appointments and openings are made available on the basis of political credentials. Political apathy would only permit this injustice to proceed. Only through interest, commitment, and criticism will this ever be changed. Were we to follow Mr. David's confused advice we would subversively accept this corrupt political order. It is very important that we realize that political apathy is tacit support of the established political order and, as such, is a political position. Secondly, he cites the problem of graffiti, in the form of political slogans, on walls and sidewalks of European university cities. This problem itself has nothing to do with the merits or demerits of political interest and enthusiasm. Football fans often get carried away and paint slogans and generally make a mess of some areas. It would be stupid to blame football, or sports in general, for the excesses and irresponsibility of certain supporters. Similarly, it is stupid to advocate political apathy because occasionally political enthusiasm and energy is misdirected. In short, both of the "extremes" Mr. David cites have nothing whatever to do with political interest and awareness.

Mr. David claims, "It is almost tautological to say man does not learn from history..." First, since "tautology" means that something is necessarily true by virtue of its logical form, a statement cannot be "almost" tautological. It either is or it is not. Secondly, "man does not learn from history..." is not in any sense a tautology. It is, rather, an empirical proposition. Thirdly, while Mr. David may not have learnt anything from history (or logic apparently) there is no reason to believe mankind has not learned a great deal from history.

That Mr. David holds the views he does is, I think, most regrettable. However, if his claim that "most" Queen's students agree with him is true, that would be tragic.

BA a 'gourmet meal' says reader

Dear Editor,

I protest the recent discussion of the so-called problem of overeducated, unemployed graduates; such a discussion implies a call for a revision to utility in the purpose of university and it thus offends learning's ancient raison d'être: the development of the critical faculty.

The offenders derive their critique from strictly modern and therefore, limited ideas of labour and education. These ideas are curiously salient features of both classical Marxism and capitalism; both ways of thought originated in the nineteenth century when, for the first time, large groups of people began to learn reading and writing in order to work, historically literacy underwent a revolution in definition at that time. It had previously featured some understanding of history, literary and rhetorical traditions, spiritual dynamics, and even philosophical inquiry. The new literacy abandoned these features whence economic and commercial necessity created a populous that could merely decipher and record words, on the job and in the shopping plazas. High school education for the masses has thus become predicated on the bread-and-butter activity of labour in both the capitalist and socialist oriented part of the world. In the capitalist frame one goes to school to learn the three R skills so that employers and buyers can help businessmen "get on" with the business of business; and to the Marxist, school learning contributes to the class struggle and the overall material advancement of the working classes. (During the Russian Revolution the new literacy was especially volatile: to the illiterate the printed word is a mysterious symbol of respect and authority; thus, when Russian peasants were first taught to read by the Bolsheviks their primer was often the Communist Manifesto and they invariably believed whatever they read.) Both Marxist and capitalist ideas thus chain learning to utility and material betterment.

Up to now university has protected itself from these utility notions of education by maintaining that it is only when one removes oneself from the fetters of the world can one become critical of it. Our tower is made of ivory for a reason: to the nineteenth century notions of utility the university answers that the art of inquiry can only thrive in a condition of what the Greeks meant by leisure.

To the Greeks leisure was not a playground for indolent behaviour but an opportunity to study critically human art and natural life. Indeed, the derivative of the Greek word for leisure ties itself also to the Greek word for discipline. And as Homer's story of Odysseus's travels were borrowed by Virgil, so to Roman civilization adopted this Greek concept of leisure that was ultimately handed down to us; the concept that leisure creates the precious opportunity to gain a perspective on life, to review where we've been, where we are, and where we may be going. Cicero thus said: "Live every day as if it were your last; make every moment of leisure a time for doing what the man of labour has no time to do. If we limit education to 'learning the ropes,' the daily skills to be applied, we are no better off than the animals of the forest which know nothing but survival and instinct."

Stop jumping to conclusions

Dear Editor:

Hi there! I wonder how many readers skimmed through the AMS - student opinion-referendum article on the front page of Tuesday's Journal. I always like to see what the AMS is screwing up so I read the article a couple of times, and started wondering. It seems that the AMS has already taken a stand with the OFS concerning free tuition, differential fees for foreign students and rumoured tuition hikes, and they have the fear that if they put these issues on a campus-wide referendum, then the Queen's student body would vote against their stand.

First of all, isn't the AMS supposed to be representing the Queen's students? If they thought that they would be defeated in such a referendum, why did they tell the OFS what they thought, rather than the wishes of the students?

Secondly, the AMS said it would be an embarrassing situation if they had to reverse their decision before the OFS. Are Jamie and his buddies afraid of getting a little flak from the OFS for admitting their stupidity? I think it would be a sign of maturity for the AMS to admit their mistakes. Also, it would teach them not to jump to conclusions about what the Queen's student body wants.

The last three paragraphs are devoted to the topic of whether the three issues previously mentioned should be presented to the students in the form of a referendum or an opinion poll. Does it really matter? Whatever you call it, the results are still going to be whatever the students say, whether it be in accordance with what they think or not.

It's because of trivialities which occupy the minds of the AMS for so long and the resultant wishy-washiness, that most students don't want to get involved with student politics. The red tape and the bureaucracy is stifling, and when the next election is held, and the PDS is in power, then we will see a change. Bill Kitcher

At least in the gaining of an initial degree, university should be thought of as a gourmet meal at a fine restaurant, one looks at the menu, selects his courses, "digests" the meal, pays the cheque, and leaves having benefited from an experience that may make his palate a little more sensitive and critical. Only the university environment can provide the leisure for gaining perspective. It should therefore not be tampered with, for then even the graduate will passively accept the world and "become what he beholds".

Wasted resources

by Pam Cooper

The announcement late last week by Statistics Canada that the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate has hit a fifteen year high went relatively unnoticed in the press. The rate for October was 7.6 percent, the highest since May 1961. According to the official definition, there are 679,000 people in Canada unemployed and seeking work.

These national, official figures on unemployment are misleading if taken at face value. The unemployment rate is underestimated as it does not include several categories of people. Women, who attempt to find a job but are unable to do so, and therefore stay in the home are not included. People who seek full time employment but are only able to find part-time work are also not counted. Others who have given up looking or who are discouraged from even trying are also excluded. If these groups were counted, the unemployment rate could conceivably be at least 2 percent higher.

Moreover, unemployment hits different groups very unequally. Unemployment is a regional problem in Canada, being much higher in the Maritimes and in Quebec than in the rest of the country. All four Atlantic provinces and Quebec have adjusted rates in excess of 10 percent. These regions, underdeveloped and depressed, tend to be hit hardest and first by recession in the Canadian economy. Their underdevelopment is in part a result of the balkanization of the Canadian economy by foreign investment.

Unemployment is also unequal in its impact on different sectors of the Canadian population. The young have an especially high unemployment rate; males between the ages of 15 and 24 have an unemployment rate of 13.3 percent; females in the same age group have a rate of 12.6 percent. Low wage and unskilled workers also tend to be hit hardest by unemployment. Women are the classic example of the easily expendable labour force, last hired, first fired, and tending to disappear into the homes, and therefore, not counting in the unemployment rolls.

This high unemployment rate is a direct result of the government's current policy of fiscal restraint in conjunction with the anti-inflation policy. Since these figures were released last week, the government has said that it plans to do nothing at the current time to alleviate the unemployment problem, claiming that inflation is the first task of the government. In addition, calls for increased fiscal restraint, and for the reduction of spending on, in particular, social services and unemployment benefits are still being made.

The government clearly plans to fight inflation on the backs of those least able to protect themselves. The current inflation rate is 6.2 percent (for the past 12 months). This is not due to the AIB, rather it is due to the fall in prices in sectors not covered by the controls. It is highly unlikely that the controls will be able to have a significant effect on inflation. It can be argued that the choice between inflation and unemployment has changed. The choice of two evils has worsened, it is no longer possible to reduce the one without a substantial increase in the other. The policy options have worsened and the tradeoffs of the past are no longer relevant.

At best, the government's indifference to the unemployment rate and its terrific cost in terms of wasted human resources may be seen as a result of a mistaken belief that only in this way can inflation be "wrestled to the ground." However, it is more likely that the government's choice of policy is politically motivated. It can be argued that full employment in capitalism is not possible or politically desirable in the long run. In many ways, the government's current economic policy seems to be attempting to find a scapegoat for its economic problems. The AIB and unemployment are being used to discipline labour, to teach labour a lesson. Public announcements of the government claim this is not so, but the reality of the effects of government policy are quite different.

Outer Council afraid of student opinion

by Jamie Avis, AMS President

It is impossible for me to explain the decisions of the Outer Council concerning the November referendum, so I will not attempt to do so. However, in view of the well deserved criticism which has appeared in letters to the editor and in editorials, I want to make it clear to everyone that the position adopted by Outer Council is quite different than that recommended by the executive.

Executive plans since mid-summer have been that the November referendum should be used to allow students to participate directly in AMS policy making. We realized that any referendum decision would become binding AMS policy; we would not have it any other way. We do not believe that we can answer these questions better or more responsibly than a majority of students. Surely the AMS is not so big nor its council so remote, that the student body can not be called upon to express its views in a truly democratic fashion.

Outer Council does not share this view point and Outer Council quite rightly has the final say in such matters. But if Outer Council for some reason felt that it did not want to trust the student body to make basic policy decisions on principles which are relevant to all students, it should have kept the question off the ballot altogether. Instead we are to have an "opinion poll" on the question of free tuition and the results of this poll will not be constitutionally binding on Outer Council.

This avoidance of a binding referendum by a semantic ruse adds insult to injury. Not only are students deprived of the right to a determinative vote, they are asked to state their views but told that the Outer Council, may ignore those views.

As an opinion poll this vote will have almost no probative value. If a proper opinion poll is wanted, it could be constructed in a statistically sound manner by our AMS researcher. Votes in campus wide elections are useful for making decisions. They are not at all useful for making factual determinations about student opinion.

The same people will vote and no doubt they will vote in the same way whether the question takes the form of a referendum or an opinion poll. For me the effort will be the same. I will personally consider the results of the opinion poll on free tuition just as binding as the results of the referendum on foreign student tuition. It would be irresponsible to espouse any other attitude.

The final inconsistency in the referendum policy is that while the fee tuition question is only an "opinion poll", the foreign students differential fee question is allowed to proceed as a referendum. Surely the reasons for disallowing the former question as a referendum item apply to the latter as well. One is tempted to infer that some Council members are worried about the outcome of a referendum on free tuition and wish to be free to set a policy which they know does not reflect the view of the majority of their constituents. I certainly hope that no such inference is justified.

A student society must be representative of student opinion if it is to be credible and effective. The present executive endorses this principle above all others. We hope we have shown the strength of our beliefs by our actions.

We were willing to be governed by the vote of the student body. We hoped that by involving people directly in decision making we would increase student interest in the issues that face the AMS, and that the AMS could function effectively and with more credibility as a result.

I hope I have made my position clear. Let me close by urging you to get out and vote for a new rector and for the principles in which you believe.

Pride in your plants

African violets — by Rod Pryde

Because African violets are one of the most popular houseplants, I have decided to discuss its culture first.

African violets grow best in an east-facing or west-facing window. If they must have a southern exposure, screen them from direct sunlight from April until November when the sun is too strong. Too much light produces small-leaved specimens. When African violets are growing they should have a temperature between 65 deg. F and 75 deg. F; lower temperatures cause the leaves to turn pale and curl downward. During its resting period, however, the temperature may drop to 60 deg. F.

African violets can be watered from the top or bottom. Allow the soil to dry slightly between watering and use room-temperature water to prevent leaf spotting. Don't water the crown because it will rot. These plants can tolerate dry air but grow best in a humid environment. If you mist your plants allow them to dry away from direct sunlight.

You can purchase pre-mixed African violet soil or you can mix your own using one part each of loam, sand and peat. When buds first appear, fertilize African violets every two to three weeks, reducing this rate only when your plants enter their dormant period. Use a well-balanced fertilizer, 5-10-5 or 4-12-4, since a fertilizer that contains too much nitrogen will produce lush foliage but no flowers.

African violets can be propagated by three different methods, seeds can be sown in February and November, leaf cuttings can be taken in August and November, and large plants can be divided up. Large plants with languishing blooms should also be divided up.

This plant can't be trained or shaped by pruning it. The leaves can be cleaned by using a soft camel's hair brush or by misting. If the stems or outer leaves touch the edge of clay pots they may rot. To prevent this, cover the rim with aluminum foil or cellophane tape.

Swine Flu

Public faced with crisis or tempest in a teapot?

by Beverly Clendinning

The swine flu is coming — or is it? Should we be more concerned about this virus than any other? Will we have to do battle with this mercurial mini-monster? Ontario has decided upon a mass immunization programme against swine flu virus. SHOULD YOU BE VACCINATED?

To clear the air and counteract misconceptions which must have arisen from the Journal's front page article on Tuesday, October 24, let us consider the current problem of swine flu.

The possibility of another attack of the swine flu virus implicated in the 1918 flu epidemic has become a household concern. However, it has yet to begin in alarming ways in the northern hemisphere. There were not "34 deaths in the United States this year due to swine flu." Of those immunized against the swine flu virus in the United States, 34 people did die. But these people died of natural causes. According to Dr. J.H. Day, Clinical Immunologist at Queen's, there is no evidence whatsoever that there is any relation between the 34 recorded deaths and the immunization.

Indeed, there are many who feel this may not be the "Year of the Swine." Dr. R.B. Stewart, Head of the Department of Microbiology and Immunology at Queen's, points out that the influenza virus activity in the southern hemisphere, which has always been an indicator of what we in North America can expect during our influenza season, has not provided any proof that swine influenza is to be expected in epidemic proportions during 1976-77.

Earlier this year, there was an indication that a serious threat to the public did exist when numerous cases of swine influenza were diagnosed in New Jersey, U.S.A. and one death occurred. As a result, warnings were issued and we are not being offered a chance to arm ourselves against the possible onslaught.

The unique aspect of the 1918 epidemic, which was produced by the swine flu virus, is that it attacked the young and robust, the 20-40 age group. This is dissimilar to most flu viruses which are primarily dangerous to the over-65 age group. The effect of the virus was a marked inflammatory reaction in the lungs, developing almost overnight. There are cellular infiltrate in the lung tissue and transudation of fluid in the lungs. It is safe to say this swine flu influenza is unique. An epidemic of it would probably result in many more deaths than would occur with a usual influenza virus.

Influenzae Viruses: The Quicksilver Marauders

You might ask why one cannot be immunized once and for all against influenza or at least receive a vaccination which can be made current with periodic booster shots. The answer lies in the special characteristics of the viruses themselves.

Viruses have been classified into 3 types: A, primarily responsible for epidemics and pandemics (world-wide epidemics); B, causing illness which is usually restricted to a definite geographical area (endemic); and C, a relatively rare type. Swine flu virus and most of the viruses of major concern belong to type A.

The typing is based on antigenic differences. There are three antigens of concern. The designation as type A, B or C, is based on viral nucleic acid antigens — its ribonucleoprotein. Subtyping depends on two antigenic properties of the outer surface of the virus — a hemagglutinin and a neuraminidase. These latter antigens lead to such familiar classifications as A Hong Kong, A Swine, and A Asian. The human body can react against these antigens with production of antibody in an attempt to ward off disease. If each of these antigens was stable, a universal flu vaccine could be developed and each of us could be protected once and for all against all influenza viruses.

However, the antigenic properties of viruses are not stable. Through a process called antigenic drift, the hemagglutinin and neuraminidase antigens change slightly from time to time. Moreover, when antigenic shift occurs, the viral ribonucleic acid is altered dramatically. Since antibodies are specific only for the antigens which produced them, the human body does not have protective antibodies when these changes occur. We must then be vaccinated each time the virus changes its antigenicity to the extent that our antibodies are not protective.

Swine flu virus, or more properly A New Jersey 76, has a dissimilar antigenic relationship to the A Victoria virus which has been prevalent recently and to which most of us have some antibody. However, the swine flu virus is antigenically similar to the virus involved in the 1918 influenza pandemic which proved to be so devastating.

The issues that were involved in this epidemic are complex. It was a period in which there was also a typhoid epidemic and a viral epidemic associated with encephalitis. Yet the statistics indicate that 30-40 million people died throughout the world as a result of an influenza infection associated with inflammatory lung reaction and non-bacterial pneumonia (550,000 of those people were in the United States).

As was stated previously, the swine flu kills the young, vigorous robust adults. Other high-risk individuals seem to be among those with pre-existing lung disease, and cardiovascular problems. People over 65 suffering from chronic diseases and pregnant women also have a high risk of death from swine flu. Apparent differences in susceptibility have been related to climate, with some of the most serious epidemics being in the tropical zone. Possibly, there is some correlation between swine flu susceptibility and crowded living conditions and social customs such as attitudes toward infected individuals.

An important aspect in the human response to influenza virus infection is that expressed in the Doctrine of Original Sin. This states that the first strain of influenza virus that infects an individual will produce antibodies that will be detectable for life. When an antigenic change occurs, since the population has not met the "new" virus before, they have no characteristic antibody against the new strain.

During the 1857-58 pandemic of Asian flu, at that time a "new" strain, antibodies against this virus were found among the age group who were alive in 1889. The Asian flu was thus considered a recurrence of the 1889 epidemic. In a similar way, the cases in New Jersey this year responded with an antibody similar to the one found in persons who survived the 1918 epidemic. This then is the evidence for a recurrence of the swine flu influenza.

What are the implications of this Doctrine for the anticipated swine flu viral attack? Those persons born after 1920 do not have antibodies against swine flu virus, and thus need a vaccination to produce such antibodies, those born before do possess these antibodies. However, the mere presence of specific antibody is not a guarantee of protection. The antibody level of the blood must be sufficiently high to be of value. This will be accomplished with vaccination that stimulated the antibody already present and about a specific immune response specific for swine flu or be produced more quickly, later quantities, and will persist longer time in those who already have some level of these antibodies. Finally, a smaller dose of antigen will be needed to induce a level of antibodies.

Ontario has decided to go with an immunization program of live vaccines, combinations of A and A New Jersey, which react against both the current and swine flu, will be given to those of age and older. These are generally susceptible to all of flu, and thus need protection against the currently prevalent one as well as the anticipated one. A live vaccine, A New Jersey, administered to those 20 years to 65 years and will be effective against swine flu virus only.

The arguments against flu vaccination for children, the mortality rate among children the 1918 epidemic was among children, there is a greater of vaccine-caused fever, without application of convulsions; and the antibody maturity has not reached a level at which the immune to the vaccine would be so to warrant the vaccine's use, should a child have some or cardiovascular problem, flu should be considered.

If swine flu is considered, treatment involves rest and fluid (i.e. adequate fluid intake), corticosteroid treatment, and antibiotics if a secondary bacterial invader is detected.

If an outbreak of flu among those who are not dead, amantadine hydrochloride is used to circumscribe the virus. This chemical is effective against A and may be used prophylactically to prevent a flu epidemic. After adequate treatment, although the individual is not infectious, that is, this chemical does not necessarily prevent infection, it reduces the effects of the virus.

There are 40,000 doses of amantadine hydrochloride on hand at the Ministry of Health in Ontario. The hydrochloride must be given throughout the course of the period of exposure in doses twice a day. Thus, the plan to its use if necessary and reject the idea of immunization is impractical. Moreover, the immunization stimulated the protective level of antibodies produced by one's own body as opposed to the ingestion of a chemical to prevent severe illness.

Swine Flu Vaccine: Friend or Foe?

Your decision about immunization needs result from a weighing of the benefits and risks involved. Consider the pros and cons.

CONSEQUENCES OF SWINE FLU:

Direct-Sudden onset and very rapid development of disease; i.e. the inflammatory response.

Non-bacterial pneumonia; i.e. cannot be treated with antibiotics.

Indirect croup, asthma, encephalitis, myelopathy, polycytemia, Reye's syndrome.

Rare pericarditis, myocarditis, lymphatic leukemia, suppression of cell-mediated immunity, tendency to neoplastic activity (tumor formation).

COMPLICATIONS OF VACCINE:

Common - 34 percent increase in temperature, with this response beginning within six hours and lasting up to 24 hours -- local erythema induration in (redness/swelling) approximately 50 per cent of cases.

Rare - anaphylaxis, an exaggerated allergic reaction, caused by a rare egg-related allergy, encephalopathy, asthma.

For a patient with an allergy history, a skin test of egg extract can be administered to determine sensitivity.

Susceptibility - 20-40 year age group: pregnant women, elderly with cardiovascular or other chronic illnesses.

Contraindications - under 12 years of age: individual with egg allergy, fever, or who has had a recent vaccination, (i.e. within the last 14 days).

This is the dilemma then. Where lies the balance of benefits and risks? Can the scales be tipped in your favour?

Dr. Day definitely recommends immunization for those 20 years of age and over. It is postulated that swine flu vaccine reduces the inflammatory response which is the main cause of death. Immunization lasts for six months to one year in 70-90 per cent of people. This is a conservative estimate. It consists of a highly purified killed vaccine preparation. The response to the vaccination is adequate in those 20 years of age and older. The vaccine will be administered through the Medical Officer of Health at the Health Unit. THE NEXT MOVE IS YOURS.

Grandfather Clock

by Ziuta

Justin was born today:
Soon he shall trace angels in his snow-white baptismal dress.....
Grandfather reads the headlines, yellowed
with tired stars in his eyes.
Christmas Eve shall be sorrowing children on his knee knowing from 'wise folk talkin' that Grandpa was bound to go despite all them homespun tales of his driftin' youth
And their eyes averted admit that cancer would eat him up anyway, leaving behind
his solid oak clock.

Time Spent

by Chris Carroll

A baby usually spends his time
Crawling around naked,
When he starts to grow up though
His mother puts him into clothes.
And when he's old enough, in the winter,
She bundles him up with a multitude of pants, underpants, shirts, sweaters, mitts, scarves, coats and hats.
Then lets him outside into the wintry world,
Watching from the window.
Well, he can hardly walk he's so well dressed,
And he can't just sit down and look around for fear he'll never get up again:
And he can't take off the clothes
Because his Mom put them on so well,
And anyway he'd freeze if he did.
So he hobbles around for a while, looking straight ahead,
(that's the only spot he can see, his scarf's on so tight)
And then his mother calls him in,
Back to the warmth of home,
Where she undoes his bulky hindrances,
And, with love, hugs him close,
Proud of her brave young man.
And the little one thinks
That somehow this last part makes it all worthwhile.

Autumn Orchard

by Francis O'Flinn

And the pink sun fails to shine on green meadows where the children played.
Where long ago the young men sang to the tune of chirping birds,
As the trees danced in the springtime wind.
The silly songs of happy children cease to echo in the valley where youngsters used to play.
And the time weary eyes of a once young lad are filled with lonesome water,
As he searches for the apple tree
Where he and others battled,
In wars-waged in other days.
His ear craves for the evening ballad of blackbirds
Even as the night takes hold.
Once there was laughter,
Where now, only silence speaks.
Once there were cries of joy
Where now, only whimpers
Tell of yesterday.
His springtime days were blossoms
Blowing careless in the wind,
Till summer-made them apples.
Never again to know the joys of freely dancing
On branches
Kissed by orange suns
And yellow moons.
And loved by all who understand
That apples, come from blooms.

Cherry Orchard: a well-conceived production

by Donald Rayko

11 November, 19--

Dear Masha,

I trust that you and your family are well. Please give my kindest regards to Pyotr Alexeyevich, and tell Sonia and little Grisha that their uncle sends kisses now and will bring them many fine presents from abroad when next he sees them.

I must tell you about a most remarkable thing I have seen. These last few days I have spent in a place called Kingston; it is a charming provincial town located at the confluence of Ontario Lake, St. Lawrence River and a canal system that joins this place to the capital of this country. In this town of Kingston there is to be found a university. (Strangely, the university is called "Queen's"—I have asked several of the inhabitants here why it is not "King's", but have met only with blank stares!) Last night I attended a play put on by the drama department of this university, and you can imagine my surprise when it turned out to be Chekhov's The Cherry Orchard! (By the way, the performance was in a place called "Convocation Hall", but when I asked someone how they managed to have both plays and convocations in one place, I was told that they did not have convocations there, but in a hockey arena. Nothing is what it seems here. I wonder where they play their hockey games. In a concert hall, perhaps?)

In any case, as I sat waiting for the performance to commence, I began to wonder what these Canadians would do with our Chekhov. Previously I had heard that he is generally regarded here as a humourless, lugubrious pessimist in whose plays nothing ever happens. Can you imagine that! If this is true, perhaps it is because they know so little about the man and about the history of our country. Can they know that it was written in 1904, as Chekhov was in his last months dying of tuberculosis, and the listless, dispirited prerevolutionary intelligentsia were in a malignant state of torpor and decay? and that nearly the whole of our country truly was like an ancient orchard, neglected and decrepit, with the fruit fallen and rotting upon the ground? Can they appreciate the great humanity, compassion and inner optimism of the man? how, though he objectively diagnosed and portrayed the flaws and afflictions of his countrymen, he discerned and presented their hidden power to beauty and ennobled life, their eternal longings for happiness, their upward strivings? Do they apprehend the wry pity he felt for the victims of the social decay of Mother Russia? or his recognition of the uneluctable solitude of men and women? This, Masha, is what I wondered, and I had grave rebodings of what I was to see.

The remarkable thing, dear Masha, is that the people at this Queen's University did seem to have some understanding of Chekhov. The Cherry Orchard, you will remember, is the ancient, massive orchard that forms part of the indebted estate of Madame Ranevskaya and her ineffectual brother, Gayev. The prodigality of this upperclass family and their refusal to surrender old ways and old self-images and to cut down the orchard and lease the land for summer villas means that the estate must be auctioned off to pay arrears. The charming but useless world comes to an end, and the doomed household is dispersed. The play ends with the sound of the cherry trees being chopped down by the new owner—the end of one order, the beginning of the next.

The director was a man called Richard Trousdell. I was most impressed with his conception of the play: he well understood the exquisite structural balances of that play and the essential ensemble quality of it, that it is the entire cast that is important, that there are no central characters more important than the others. This pleased me. Also the costumes were well designed. This was the work of Bruce Kyle. Clean colours and distinct lines in costumes, together with an attractive, economically dressed air set by Tony Abrams provided a very advantageous medium for successful lighting effects, both rich and wistful, by Paul Moulton.

The cast also impressed me, especially the actresses. Lois Lorimer, Susan Coyne, Wendy Crewson, Shelley Ledger, Eleanor Aylesworth, these women are all students, but each one was surprisingly good, each managing to portray a range of emotions and facets to the personality of her role that I would not have expected of students. All the actors and actresses were students, and therefore young; those who had to play characters who were old could not quite bring it off, though. This is a difficult thing to do, I realize, and they were cursed with some terribly coarse makeup (designed for a hockey arena, perhaps), but I often wished they were off the stage; especially Pishchik, the landowner, and Firs, the valet. This is not to say that they did not try hard to do difficult things, but they detracted from the polish of the others, I am afraid. And that was such a pity, for the older people are the embodiment of the decay, and therefore so important to the play.

Perhaps, Masha, I am going on unduly about the shortcomings; for, those few flaws aside, it was truly a superior production. Compassionate, balanced and astute. I confess that I have always found Chekhov far better on stage than when read from a book. Perhaps that is the source of the widespread disregard for him here. I hope that many Canadians go to see this fine production. They will be disabused of their misconception. The programme is on again next week, and I intend to go again if I am still in this town.

Lovingly yours,

Mishka

P.S. Before I close, I must tell you of one more curious thing I have noticed, and ask your advice. Many many people talk of "oily thighs" here. I have not yet asked anyone about this apparent local fetish. Do you think it would be excessively immodest for me to do so?

THE GLORIOUS BEER OF COPENHAGEN

Pears and Ellis: music of the spheres

by Fenela Childs

On Thursday, November 11th, Peter Pears, tenor, and Osian Ellis, harp, appeared in Kingston as part of the Grant Hall concert series. Those who attended the concert were privileged indeed: the combination of a distinguished tenor and a harpist with a magical touch was unforgettable. Throughout the performance, each provided the perfect complement to the other's talents.

Even before the program began, the mood of the evening was set by the great harp standing centre-stage and gleaming golden under the lights - surely the most beautiful of instruments to look at as well as listen to. With the appearance of the two performers, impeccably dressed in tuxedos, it required but little imagination to return in time to the culture of another age.

The first item of the program consisted of four songs by Henry Purcell, beginning in a slow mood with his "Morning Hymn" and ending on a fast, humorous note with "Take not a woman's anger ill." In these songs, the light delicacy of the harp blended perfectly with the sound of the tenor. The deceptive fragility of Mr. Pears' physical appearance concealed a continuing mastery of his profession. Although he was not always as strong in subsequent pieces as he could have been, on the whole his voice was well-controlled and clear.

Following the Purcell songs came Schubert's Harfenspieler Lieder - three songs set to texts by Goethe and composed by Schubert at the age of nineteen. The sounds of the harp again showed an extreme delicacy of touch and mastery of technique, while Pears displayed excellent tone control and clarity.

It was with the third item of the programme that one of the high points of the evening was reached. This was the first time that the audience was presented with the powers of the harp, not as an accompanist, but as a solo instrument, upon which the performance of Ellis was superb. The work was composed by John Parry, the famous blind harpist of the early nineteenth century, and is his "Harp Sonata in D major." Playing from memory, Ellis provided a fascinating display of technique, finding a thousand and one ways of coaxing music out of his instrument. The work itself had three movements, allegro, andante and gavotte, and was an example of the best in the long tradition of harp composition.

The second half of the concert was devoted to two works by the modern English composer Benjamin Britten. The first was another harp solo - the "Harp Suite in C major." The work was especially composed for Osian Ellis, who describes the composer as "one of the few contemporary composers who can still write in C major." First performed by Ellis at the 1969 Edinburgh Festival, the work has five movements. It begins with a ceremonial overture, reminiscent of Bach and Handel, and then moves on to a Toccata, described by Ellis as the necessary "showing-off piece" for any instrument. After a nocturne, the faster pace of the fugue provided a touch of humour in the work, which ended with a slow Welsh hymn, perhaps a tribute to the nationality of the performer.

The last scheduled work on the program was "A Birthday Hymn," written as a birthday present to the Queen Mother from Britten, and performed by Pears and Ellis for her. One of Britten's most recent compositions, the work is based on the poems of Robert Burns. One of the most notable of the group of songs was "Aton Water," where the notes of the lute bore an uncanny resemblance to the sound of the river flowing.

The encore of the evening was an adaptation, again by Britten, of a Newfoundland song "She's like the swallow that flies so high." The sound produced here was beautifully peaceful and contemplative, using to its fullest advantage the unusual nature of the tenor-harp combination. It was the final display, in all its glory, of the perfect harmonies of Pears and Ellis.

Bitter Grounds

Ian Tamblyn puts on a lukewarm show

by Sandy Graham

Ottawa folk singer Ian Tamblyn appeared at Bitter Grounds last Saturday evening and gave the patrons three sets of simple unpretentious music. Anyone hoping to discover the deeper meaning of life in his repertoire would have been disappointed, for the simple reason that Tamblyn doesn't seem to regard his music as the refined art form that other performers do. He sings about anything and everything and doesn't seek to philosophise or preach to his audiences. Introducing one of his sections he announced proudly that it had no depth whatsoever. "Besides," he mumbled into the microphone, "from time to time I like not to sing from a bottom of a well."

He opened his first set with a "swimming song" in remembrance of his less than successful attempts at sailing on Lake Ontario. At once, one is struck by the familiar nature of his songs, most of which dwell on themes derived from personal experiences. The distinctive feature is that he seems to have lived a fairly ordinary life, one which just about everybody has lived at one time or another.

A great many performers will belt out sixties surfing songs as though they had actually been there soaking up the sun when it all happened. Tamblyn on the other hand tells how surfing music swept over the kids of Fort William and how his challenge of Lake Superior on a slab of foam insulation came to a rocky conclusion. He sings of a girl he loved from a distance and of the merry tunes he used to compose in his head on the way home from school. "Sure was a good song and once you got it going you could sing it all day long." One of his more melodic and moving songs was one of encouragement to a friend who "paints waves and mountains."

On many of the songs he did that were written by others one could recognize some of the music that has influenced Tamblyn. He did a strong Sam Cooke number "All Night Long" and his rendition of "On Broadway" was refreshingly open and honest without all the commercial slickness one normally associates with that song. His version of the "Mighty Quinn" and the late Danny Whiteman's "I Don't Want to Talk About It" did not come off as well, possibly because the audience was too familiar with the originals.

Technically, Tamblyn is not one to be admired. Something seems to be missing but it's hard to put a finger on it. Perhaps it is his piano: he said he normally plays half his numbers on piano but at Bitter Grounds piano was out of tune he was forced to stay with a guitar which really didn't want to play the third set. It wasn't hard to understand as it wasn't an especially lyrical or inventive one and Tamblyn admits that he is not much of a technician. His rhythmic slashes were often loud and jumped noticeably in volume with each chord. The tones were often muddled, the sound of each string running imperceptibly into the next.

The lead was handled by "Harmonic" Jeff Willis whose playing was very original and exciting but barely audible. He shone on Jackson Brown's "These Days." Vince Vacuous on drums was especially effective. Tamblyn's voice was raw and unpolished and would have been considered as distinctive except that he sang with little energy or adventure. He performed with pretty much the same volume and tone throughout the sets but was definitely more aggressive by the third. The show seemed "bogged down and tired at times" and even threatened to become repetitious.

Tamblyn is a singer for the sake of the song (he had a great time doing a Quebec nonsense song, a genre he admired because they were composed purely for the joy of singing). Ian Tamblyn said in his best song of the evening about campfire singing "I'm not trying to be a star, there's enough of them in a summer's evening." One hopes he can transfer his off-stage enthusiasm to his singing and playing, and that next time he appears he'll be able to play the piano. His imagination deserves the chance.

Folksinger Ian Tamblyn put on an uneven performance on Saturday at Bitter Grounds.

Italian guitar trio is a rare treat

On Monday, November 22 at 8:30 p.m. in Convocation Hall, the Trio Chitarristico Italiano will be presenting a concert of late 18th century and 20th century music for three guitars. The guitar virtuosos, Alfonso Borghese, Roberto Frosali, and Vincenzo Sardarelli, who received their training in Italy and North America, are now teaching classical guitar in Italy. This is the trio's first concert trip to North America.

One of the results of the recent surge in popularity and interest in the classical guitar is its revival in chamber music. The Trio Chitarristico was formed a few years ago in Italy, and is almost certainly the first modern and only guitar trio. A most unusual aspect of this group is that almost all of their repertoire consists of compositions that were originally written for three guitars, some of their 18th century pieces are completely unknown.

A recent review in the Birmingham Post stated that "The three artists together produced music of the most subtle orchestral texture. Leonhard de Call's Trio, opus 26, and Filippo Cagnani's Trio, opus 12, gave us two neat and beautifully played examples of late 18th century Florentine pieces."

The trio has attracted several modern composers to write material for it and works by Carlo Prosperi, Reginald Smith Brindle and Paul Hindemith will be heard, as well as compositions by de Falla, Albeniz, Cagnani, and de Call.

A concert of music for three guitars does not occur very often and the experience should be a most enjoyable one. Andres Segovia has said of the trio: "I have heard them recently and was most impressed by their musical ability, good taste and general culture. Here one is dealing with a new form of artistic expressionism that will create a happy surprise for the philharmonic public."

Tickets are available from the Performing Arts Box Office in the old Students' Union.

Jesse Winchester good but . . .

Good Brothers steal the show

by Liz Wood

The Good Brothers are more a country band than a bluegrass band. But above all they're a singing band, a hand-clapping band. All the songs they did on Sunday night were fun for the audience and obviously for the band as well. I remember seeing them at the Horseshoe Tavern in Toronto a while back when they got four Toronto Maple Leafs up on stage to play and sing a couple of numbers with them. It didn't sound bad and it was a lot of fun for the crowd.

No Leafs tonight, but that feeling of friendliness and warmth was just the same. One of the highlights was "Fox on the run", a song that showed off the band's talents admirably. The blend was great and so was the arrangement. Drummer Bohdan Hlusko has to be one of the funkiest drummers around in Canada and his playing added a new and kicky dimension to the country-bluegrass sound.

The crowd was at its happiest during the old instrumental "Orange Blossom Special" and it really sounded as if a musical train was ramming its way through Grant Hall. Carl Keys coaxed incredible sounds from his fiddle and by the end of the song I was sure that many in the audience had come just to see the Good Brothers. The band never overshadows its vocals with instrumentals. Where David Bromberg is into hot licks, the Good Brothers are into kicks. They don't show off at all but I'm sure they could if they wanted to. The band's balance and good taste are a musical delight.

Jesse Winchester and his group set a slightly sedate pace after the "good-time" music of the Good Brothers. I enjoyed his concert but I never lost the feeling that I was listening to a lot of separate songs. There was no flow or apparent logic in the order of presentation.

Winchester has assembled a tight, versatile band and they performed a wide variety of musical treats, always the accompanists, never taking over. "Silly Heart" was a love song with a reggae beat that flowed so easily it almost ran into itself. One of the songs I enjoyed most was Winchester's slow shimmering version of "Bowling Green". It had dreamlike quality that convinced me I was lying in the Kentucky bluegrass although I've never been there.

Winchester has an incredible knack with words. He bypasses everything but the essentials and his lyrics are always unique and fresh. They imply a double meaning that occurs to you almost as you hear the words. On "You took me way back to the country" the band's accompaniment accented this characteristic so that the cadence of the tune gave the words an extra meaning.

The evening's talking blues named "Twigs and seed blues" (or Heads Lament) was supposed to be funny but it just didn't come off. It was entertaining but nothing special, to be sure.

Winchester seems at his best and most comfortable when singing his own compositions, with little accompaniment. I know I've enjoyed

Jesse Winchester gave an even but uninspired performance on Sunday night him more when he's on his own. "Mississippi you are on my mind" was a moving moment in the evening, a lament for his homeland, a desire to return (which he can't, not yet anyway). Winchester was a draft evader. All in all, the songs were great, but Winchester was somehow a little disappointing. He is a good, even performer, a song craftsman. But maybe he was a little too even (slink) on Sunday night.

At the Scarecrow

Good evening, I must be Doug McArthur

by Davis Eagle

Last weekend at Scarecrow I had another in a series of difficulties in relating to the world at large when, during the guest set I noticed that about three tables-full of people who, while waiting for the featured performer, amused themselves by doing Fonzie impersonations... or something. I wondered whether it was only me who realized both that there is a time and place for everything and that the guest artist was really good. And I do mean good. As it turned out I wasn't the only admirer of Andy Manuel; in fact, if he is given a break or two, we (the audience at Scarecrow) will form only a small part of this man's fans. I suggest you catch Mr. Manuel when he returns.

I saw the show on both Friday and Saturday nights and was amazed at two things; firstly that on Friday both the audience and McArthur seemed so tired (which is quite unlike the norm), and secondly the ability McArthur showed in preventing a total waste. He accomplished this with straight musical talent, something I'd never fully appreciated about him before. I'd always admired his songwriting, his stage presence and his obvious comic genius, but till last Friday never realized how good a musician he is. His guitar work I found especially impressive though I realize my opinion will conflict with that of a lot of people who base their judgement on flashy licks and the like. McArthur is not that kind of musician; what he does is get the exact sound that he needs to put forward his material. He doesn't make mistakes and he doesn't make it obvious so people tend to take it for granted and don't generally notice that it is right on. All the time.

The only other musician to strike me like that was Bim, and at the end of the Bim concert one of the guitarists that I think the most of, namely, Tom Handy remarked on his guitar playing above his other characteristics. It was the same with Doug McArthur on Friday night.

This new-found insight made me appreciate the show on Saturday night even more when the energy that was lacking the night before returned with what might be called vengeance (it might have been called Ishmael, I'm not sure) at any rate his usual fare of extended monologues concerning the daily trials of a self-proclaimed Hestonite worked well in setting up the audience for his music. It was a case of the common torture technique of the nice guy who is followed by the heavy, and his songs are heavy. Most of his material was taken from his first two albums "Letters From The Coast" and "Sisteron" and were well known by the audience which seemed to be comprised mostly of returnees. The majority of his tunes were ballads of the "lone traveller" variety, but they each showed a uniqueness that prevented a feeling of having heard the story before Offsetting the reflective mood induced by the introspective aspect of his nature were songs of a lighter but slightly twisted idiom. The title of one of them is "All YOU Ever Want To Do Is Take Me Home And Tie Me Up And Whip Me". Need I say more?

Overall it was an interesting and enjoyable, if not informative weekend, and I feel fairly certain that I'm not alone in wishing a repeat of both McArthur's and Manuel's performance in the near future. Next week brings the return of Mose Scarlett to Scarecrow with his first performance in Kingston since his successful engagement last spring. Scarlett spent some time with Leon Redbone a few years ago and his guitar style proves that the time was put to good use. Those who can't respect an artist (including the guest artist) by paying attention will be drawn, quartered and refused the right to watch the Leafs play for the next three weeks.

Wins for Hockey Gals

by Sue [Mini] Creighton and Kathy [Woody] Wood

The regular season opened this weekend for Queen's Ice Hockey Gals as they thoroughly trounced both the Western Mustangs and the Guelph Gryphons.

Friday night at University of Western Ontario, the Gals blanked their opponents 6-0. The game got off to a slow start with no scoring until halfway through the second period when Sue (Wright) Thompson netted the first in her sequence of three goals for the evening - two of which were scored when Western was shorthanded. The third period saw three more goals for Queen's. The first by Cathy Eberts at the start of the period and the last two attained by Anne (Pepsi) Symes. There were many penalties for both teams throughout the game, but this seemed to affect only Western, as four out of the six goals against them were scored when they were shorthanded. Queen's had some problems getting set-up, but there was obviously an improvement over last week's performance where only three goals in two games were scored (two of these against Western). This was goalie Wanda Cyde's first (but not last) shutout victory of the season.

Saturday afternoon saw the Gals, after being put through a musical dressing rooms routine lace the Gryphons 6-1. This game started off a lot faster with Queen's drawing first blood at 3:17 of the first period on a goal by Sandy (Zsa-Zsa) Statten. Queen's 3rd doubles entry, also played like a dynamic duo and were stopped only once from Total victory by the Western team.

Badminton hit this weekend was fast and furious. Hopefully the Gals will be able to keep up this pace in two weeks time when they go to U. of T. to play the Part I East Sectional tournament on Nov. 27. For this tough tournament the team will need a continuation of the strong support they received this weekend from their manager and player substitute Laurel McIntyre and Martha Nadorozny.

The Gals came roaring back again in the third period with goals by Jane Shorten, Debbie Adams and Sue Thompson. At this point, Queen's thought they had duplicated their performance of the previous evening but unfortunately, with only 38 seconds left to play, Guelph put on a final spurt of energy and managed to sneak a goal past Queen's Wanda Cyde.

The Gals are at home this coming weekend with a 6:30 encounter Friday night against York University and another game Saturday afternoon at 2:00 where the Gals meet their archrivals, McMaster. Both games will be well worth watching and we would like a large turnout (of Queen's students, of course) for our first home games!!

Women's badminton off to a "smashing" start

by Di Edwards

Last weekend, the Queen's women's badminton team got off to a "smashing" start in their first tournament of the season. The team travelled to Waterloo to play in the Combined I tournament. Queen's, one of the 4 East section universities, met and defeated the 5 teams from the West division which includes Western, Waterloo, Brock, Wilfrid Laurier and MacMaster universities.

Queen's accumulated a total of 38 points (1 point per match won) to win the tournament. They narrowly edged Toronto by 1 point and Guelph by 3 points. The girls' toughest competition, Western, gave them some hard games but through sheer determination and strength of performance, Queen's proved themselves superior.

Each Queen's player demonstrated top form play throughout the tournament and, under coach Bernie Houghton's training, the girls managed to drop, smash and clear their way successfully through their opposition. First singles player Diana Edwards and 5th singles Bev Koski topped the play by emerging with a total of nine victories and only one loss. Both players won all five of their singles matches and four out of five doubles matches. Bev has moved up one position on the team since last year and seems to still be able to maintain her high standard of play she exhibited last year. Diana, the 5 year veteran of the group, has moved into top position on the team and appears to have bettered her performance compared to the last few years. Perhaps some of Bev's winning streak has rubbed off on her.

Team member 2nd singles Betsy Carey, 3rd singles Sandy Koerner, 4th singles Gayle Raycraft and 6th singles Lindee Stemp were not far behind numbers 1 and 5, since each player was victorious in a total of eight out of ten matches. Each of the four players found Western to be the only university to defeat them in singles.

Betsy, who has moved up two positions on the team, showed that she could certainly handle the tougher competition encountered in comparison to last year. Sandy, another returning player from past years, has improved her performance immensely from last season. She proved herself to be some pretty tough competitor on the court. Gayle has upgraded her game enough since last year to rise from manager into 4th spot on the team. She played some very aggressive and successful games on the weekend. Special mention goes to Lindee, the rookie of the team, who apart from providing much of the team spirit off the court played a pretty mean game on the court.

In doubles play, Betsy and Sandy teamed up to take the 1st doubles position on the team and captured four victories out of a possible five. Their highlight of the weekend came when they defeated the team from Western but unfortunately they found the Waterloo opposition a bit tougher than expected. The 2nd doubles team of Diana and Gayle proved that being only a recently formed duo does not mean that they cannot play well together. Only Western provided the stopper to 5 straight victories. Bev and Lindee, Queen's 3rd doubles entry, also played like a dynamic duo and were stopped only once from Total victory by the Western team.

At London, the Mustangs converted a fumble, an interception and a blocked punt into a 21-0 lead after only 7:46 had been played. Western went on to defeat the U.B.C. Thunderbirds 30 to 8.

Gee Gees axed

Acadia Axemen upset the defending championship Ottawa U. Gee Gees 18-16 to advance to the College Bowl against the Western Ontario Mustangs at Varsity Stadium next Friday. In Halifax, Mike Murphy ran 233 yds. on 28 carries for Ottawa but managed only one point on two field goal attempts and this proved to be the difference. Axemen quarterback Bob Cameron threw to Bob Ross for the game winning T.D. late in the fourth quarter. Murphy scored both Ottawa T.D.s on runs of 22 and 89 yards.

At London, the Mustangs converted a fumble, an interception and a blocked punt into a 21-0 lead after only 7:46 had been played. Western went on to defeat the U.B.C. Thunderbirds 30 to 8.

Divers springboard to victories

Sparkling performances were given Saturday by the Queen's Men and Women springboard divers as they worked University of Toronto and York in the first Queen's Invitational Diving Meet. Unofficial points awarded on a 10, 8, 6, 4, 3, 2, 1 basis showed the Queen's people ahead by 60 to 43 for the University of Toronto and 24 for York. Diving without ailing rookie Maryann Drinkwater and veterans Doug Buckingham and Fred Kellia, Queen's divers placed three firsts, a second, three thirds a fourth and a ninth.

Janet Nutter easily beat Sharon McMurdo, 1976 C.W.I.A.U. 2nd place finisher, on both the one and three metre board. On her way she set two new Queen's pool records, scoring 432 judges points on the three metre board and 373.7 points on the one metre. Queen's freshtette Eve Wahn, ahead of McMurdo most of the way, took third place by a mere 7 points in one event, and 18 points in the other as she had one bad dive in each. Sandra McDaniel, in her first intercollegiate competition, placed a credible 9th on the one metre and should improve with a little more experience.

Not to be outdone, the inspired Queensmen also came up with excellent performances using some very easy dives. Rookie Ronald Archer outdove the opposition on the three metre board and placed second on the one metre by just 5 judges points. Rookie Greg Anderson in his first university competition took third place edging out veteran George Southey by 4 points. The men have their work cut out for them, however, in the always strong O.U.A.A. and will have to learn more difficult dives to keep their heads above water as they will discover at the Guelph swimming and diving Relays next weekend.

Men's badminton opens with win

by Sandy Sanderson [coach]

Paul Buckley, last year's top player, breezed to an easy win in the singles competition and then teamed with another hold over, Mike Stoute, to defeat all other contestants in the doubles event. The team has the potential to be a strong contender if more regular practice sessions can be put together. The coach is still looking for more experienced players who can attend at least two practices per week. Practices are held on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday from 7:15 to 9:00 pm. Anyone interested in trying out should come to the Tuesday practice. The final selection of the team will not be made until January.

Basketball gain 1st win

by Peter Still

Last weekend the Queen's Basketball team split two games on the road, a 71-67 decision over Ryerson Rams on Friday night and the following night the York Yeomen defeated Queen's 73-60.

In the first game the Golden Gaels were forced to play catch-up ball through the first part of the second half as the Rams had as much as a 6 point lead. But thanks to Derek Swinnard who reached his powerful potential by hitting 10 of 18 from the floor and 6 for 6 from the foul line to collect 26 points, the team overcame the lead with 10 minutes to go in the game. "It was a very close game", said Queen's coach Pete Smith after his team's first League victory. The coach felt the Gaels made too many fundamental mistakes and mental errors, but he said, "it feels good to win on the road."

Also putting points on the score board were Sean Pritchard with 9 points, Steve McCredy, Rob Smart, Henry Garbaty with 7 points each, Andy Boniwell 6 points, Steve Simmons with 4 points, Dave Dempster, Lorenz Paulsen with 2 points each and Bob Cooney with 1 point while Bill Petrychuk was the high for Ryerson with 13 points.

In the first half of a very fast moving game the Gaels were unable to keep pace with the Yeomen who were 11-3 last year. York made Queen's shoot only 32 percent from the field and caused the team to commit a number of violations and bad passes before halftime. Going into the locker room between periods the Gaels were on the wrong end of a 41-28 score.

During the second half Queen's came back to pull within 9 points of York, under the fire power of Derek Swinnard and Henry Garbaty who combined for 32 points and 18 rebounds. Queen's equalled York's second half scoring output. But because of their weak first half Queen's came out on the bottom.

To round out the scoring for Queen's were Dave Dempster and Andy Boniwell with 8 points each, Rob Smart with 6 points, Bob Cooney with 4 points and Steve Simmons with 2 points.

Queen's next league game is against arch rival, U of Toronto at 8:15 in Bartlett Gym on Friday, November 19.

Int. Field Hockey in 4th

Coach Groos very proud

Brian Groos, coach of the Women's Intermediate Field Hockey Team can be heard to say, "I am the proudest coach in the world," and rightly so. Though not winning very many games in the double round robin tournament, the intermediate team had very few goals scored against them. By the end of the two weekends, Queen's intermediate team stood in fourth place following Toronto, Laurentian and York respectively and beating Trent.

One of the best intermediate field hockey teams Queen's has ever produced was chosen on a cold rainy day late in September (thanks Miss G. and Nanette) and though the team wins were few, two individuals saw the light of success role. They were asked by the selection committee to try out for the Ontario Field Hockey Team. Janine Sinnis, right halfback and Mary Sulke, goalie, went to Toronto last weekend for the trials. Success and Mary teamed up once again and she was chosen as one of the goalies on the Ontario Squad. Congrats Marel!

To Brian and the team - thanks - it was a great year with lots of good times.

Waterpolo finish 2nd

Queen's Water polo team finished the regular tournament schedule with a final series at University of Toronto on the weekend. Queen's and Toronto will advance to the Ontario Championships where the eastern and western conference top two teams play off.

On the weekend Queen's defeated RMC, 16-5, and York, 13-2, and lost to Toronto, 12-0. Scoring for Queen's were Trebus and Mitch Dent with goals a piece, Dave Ardell with 6, Bob Brisbois and Mike Fox with 2 each, and Bruce Everenden and Jim Frost scoring once.

The team has two weeks to prepare for the Ontario Championships which are to be held at the Queen's pool. The four teams entered are University of Toronto and Queen's from the east, and McMaster and Western from the west.

SLU win 8-3 at Jock Harty

by Tom Shand

In an exhibition hockey game at Jock Harty Arena last Thursday evening, St. Lawrence University (from Canton, N.Y.) outscored the Golden Gaels by a score of 8-3.

The game was marred by an injury to the referee early in the second period which forced the two linesmen to handle the remainder of the game. Unfortunately, they were not up to the task.

St. Lawrence held a 2-1 lead after the opening period with Dan Walker counting both goals. Bill VanCamp broke his early season scoring drought with the first of his two goals for the Gaels.

In the middle period both the officiating and the Gaels' defensive play broke down. St. Lawrence scored four consecutive times before VanCamp replied again for the Gaels. S.L.U. scorers, in the second period, were Pete MacKenzie with a pair and Ron Harris and Dan Walenty with singles.

Although Gaels were outscored 4-1 in the second period nevertheless they did reaffirm my belief that when they want to they can be a very good hockey team. Bill VanCamp showed what a little determined back-checking can produce when he stole an excellent scoring opportunity from St. Lawrence and came back to score his second goal. B.V.'s effort seemed to light the fire under the Gaels but unfortunately time ran out in the period before they could inflict any further damage.

Gaels closed the gap to 6-3 with a power play goal at 0:27 of the third period. VanCamp picked up his third point of the match as he fed Terry Angel who moved in from the point and blasted home a 30-footer.

Queen's appeared to be on the comeback trail as Jay Babcock levied the hit of the year on an on-coming SLU forward. However one of the linesmen, in one of many moments of weakness, called Jay for charging and also assessed Gaels a bench minor. Despite a valiant defensive effort SLU's Kyle Smith finally scored while they held a two man advantage. This sequence of events took the wind out of the Gaels' sails and Crawford made the score 8-3 with five minutes left to play in the game.

Gaels travel up to Ottawa Tuesday night to meet the Gee Gees. The key to victory for the Gaels will be in their discipline and their checking by all three lines. Against St. Lawrence Andy Schell faced 42 shots and had little support on many occasions.

One bright note for the Gaels is that Ned MacIntyre and Willie Wing should be ready for Tuesday night's Ottawa game. Still on the injured list are Wayne Clapp, Dave Eaton and Ron Shephard who is in all likelihood out for the season.

Premier Wants Debate

Premier Robert Bourassa renewed his challenge to Parti Quebecois leader Rene Levesque for a radio debate Thursday on "the economic implications of Quebec independence". Levesque declined, saying that a debate on independence was premature since the PQ planned a referendum on the question. In his new challenge, the Premier dropped all conditions as to the subject of the debate.

Bourassa and Levesque have already had a two hour debate at the opening of the campaign. The Premier later refused to participate in a live television debate involving the four main party leaders. His recent challenge is seen as a last-ditch effort to boost the Liberal Party's waning popularity.

City Work Project

Kingston's social services department has a Work Activity Project designed for employable men on welfare who want to further their education and learn skills for jobs.

The project is located in an old army hospital which the men have repaired and renovated. In the mornings classes are given, and in the afternoons workshops are held. Here all sorts of activities go on, from painting cars to building picnic benches. Participants are expected to upgrade themselves to a Grade Ten level and to learn skills in areas where there are good job possibilities. They do work in the community, such as house repairs for pensioners, families on welfare and low-income people. Men stay in the program until they are prepared for a job. If they are married they earn five dollars a day plus regular welfare, if single, two and a half dollars a day.

The program has proved successful. Between February and June of 1976 jobs were found for 19 participants, but six men went on to continue their education and nine found jobs without any help from the project. Enrollment is rising too, and in 1977 about 80 men are expected to register. Recent expansion has brought in juveniles referred by the courts. The boys have their own

Charles to Wed?

What could the heir to the English throne possibly want for his 28th birthday?

A beautiful, blonde European princess, says the Sunday Mirror newspaper, linking Prince Charles with Princess Marie-Astrid of Luxembourg. The paper said there is "speculation" among European royalty that Charles plans to marry the 22-year-old daughter of Grand Duke Jean, a friend of Queen Elizabeth and Prince Philip.

Princess Marie-Astrid educated in France, is a qualified nurse working at a private clinic.

Strike in Spain

At least half-a-million people across Spain walked off the job to protest a Government program of austerity measures. The strike attracted an impressive number of industrial workers, but scarcely affected Spain's white collar and agricultural workers. Aside from sporadic confrontations between strikers and police there was little violence.

Speakers at factory assemblies attacked the Government controls on collective bargaining and wage increases. They also demanded an $85 a month raise for all workers as well as recognition of the still-illegal unions.

Standard Curriculum

The Ontario Government will be publishing new curriculum guidelines for grades 7 through 10 by next April. In these guidelines the government will be laying out the core subject content for five basic courses - English, mathematics, geography, history, and science. The new policy will not be completely rigid, but will allow the development of course content related to local needs and student interest.

Mr. Wells, Ontario Education Minister, said that the present decentralized curriculum policy, in which school boards and teachers decide what is taught, hasn't been working out as well as had been expected. Mr. Wells said that the idea "was great in theory, but it just wasn't working."

There is also a possibility that a return to standardized examinations may be made as a method of evaluating student achievement.

Flowers or Power

A rare type of snapdragon recently found in northern Maine may wreck havoc with the development of a $600-million dollar hydroelectric project funded by the American federal government. Botanists found several specimens of the furbish lousewort when they were surveying the Upper St. John River this summer.

The difficulty arises since federal projects are forbidden from destroying endangered species of plants and animals, and the furbish lousewort is included on a list of endangered species in the United States. The plants were found growing in an area that will be covered by water when the dam is built.

The plant is not "pretty or beautiful" and has "no commercial value" according to Charles Richards

Hunger Strike

The hunger strike at Millhaven Institution seems to be over. The keeper in charge for the weekend said that by Friday he thought everyone was eating.

Conditions at the prison were gradually improving, and the fast, intended to protest certain living conditions and the 24-hour lock-up of more than one hundred inmates after the rampage on October 5, ended with no bad results on the health of the fasters. Two men were hospitalized because they were diabetics, said the prison director, John Dowsett.

Queen's Ghost

The editor of the Queen's Alumni Review, Cathy Morton, is positive that Queen's has a ghost. He is, or was, Allie Pierce, a trainer and mascot at Queen's for sixty-two years.

He was an outstanding baseball and lacrosse player, and many generations of Queen's students and professors remember the cheers at football games. He died in 1951, and Queen's lost a fixed tradition.

Apparently his spirit has still remained with us, though, and he wanders through the Queen's Alumni offices, where his "ri-color suit and some of his lacrosse sticks are still

The hydroelectric project is also being opposed by environmental groups who are concerned about the loss of 88,000 acres of forest land and who want to preserve the Upper St. John River in its natural state.

50 Year Rule

Emperor Hirochito of Japan celebrated the fiftieth year of his rule last Thursday in Tokyo. The official ceremony was boycotted by most opposition politicians but was attended by members of the royal family, diplomats, and various government officials. It took place amid leftist demonstrations against the ruler and his role in the second world war.

Until 1946, when the Emperor renounced his divinity, he was considered to be a direct descendant of the mythical sun goddess Amaterasu Omikami. The Emperor is now considered to be a "symbol of the state."

Olive's State Serious

Olive Diefenbaker, 73, wife of former prime minister John Diefenbaker, is in very serious condition in an Ottawa hospital. Mrs. Diefenbaker was admitted to the hospital over three weeks ago for observation, she then broke four ribs after falling out of bed two weeks ago. Mr. Diefenbaker has cancelled all appointments for a week in order to be close to his wife.

Chochla wins nod in Queen's Rector election

Moe Chochla claimed the rectorship last night, defeating Tony Pepper by 1387 to 825 votes. There were 82 spoiled ballots. The vote represented a turnout of approximately 22 percent of the student body.

In an interview with the Journal after the results were made known, Chochla, visibly pleased with the outcome, commented "it was unfortunate that the campaign had not been longer," which would have allowed him to reach more students.

Chochla concentrated his campaign in the residence area. The issue he stressed during the election was the quality of education at Queen's. Chochla stated that he "would like to think that this orientation appealed to the people," and thus had an effect on the turnout. Chochla is currently a member of the Principal's Committee on Teaching Effectiveness and he hopes to promote a greater emphasis in this area in his dealings with the Board of Trustees.

The only voting student member of the Board of Trustees - which administers the financial dealings of the university - Chochla plans to complete a full two-year term. During this time he will seek to expand the rector's role at Queen's.

Chochla is presently a second-year student in the faculty of law. His past involvement with the AMS, Senate Committees, Residences, Faculty Board, and student societies, he felt, has provided him with "the perspective and scope necessary to carry out the position of rector at Queen's."

Federal centralization too costly says Leslie

Decentralization could be a new trend in Canadian federalism said Dr. Peter Leslie of the Queen's Political Studies Department last Tuesday. He based his statement upon recent federal proposals which outline a new formula for federal-provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act.

According to Dr. Leslie, the present shared-cost system, due to expire March 31, 1977, has become too costly. The federal government distributes tax dollars to the provinces according to their individual needs, to pay for such services as, medicare, hospital insurance and post-secondary education.

The problem with the Fiscal Arrangements Act of 1972, said Dr. Leslie, is that restraints imposed by the federal government in the allotment of these funds, infringe upon the autonomy of the provinces, because their priorities are to some extent dictated by the Federal Government. Moreover to qualify for the federal monies in shared-cost programmes, provinces have had to meet stringent specifications, of which some have found excessively expensive to fulfill.

Under the new system proposed by Ottawa, the provinces would be given more power of taxation to pay for social services with equalization payments made by Ottawa.

Some provinces oppose this decentralizing trend, however, because they fear being burdened with unnecessary costs, explained Dr. Leslie. On the other hand, he said, their richer provinces such as Ontario and B.C. welcome and can afford greater autonomy in fiscal arrangements.

Referendum results

In the referendum, held Wednesday and Thursday, Queen's students voted in favor of differential tuition fees for foreign students. In the opinion poll students voted against the principle of free tuition for post-secondary school students. On the foreign students referendum 1544 were in favor of differential fees, as prescribed by the Ontario government, and 852 against.

In the opinion poll the students voted 1634 against the principle of free tuition, while 561 voted in favor, with 238 undecided.

The responsible vote

As a voting block, Queen's students potentially have a tremendous effect on the outcome of any election in Kingston be it at the federal, provincial or municipal level. Yet, at the municipal level students have in the past displayed marked apathy, not only in terms of direct participation, but also in carrying out the relatively effortless option of voting. A large proportion of students have not even taken the trouble to put themselves on the voters list for the upcoming municipal election.

It is often suggested that, as leaders in our society, students should become more involved in local government - the level of government with which the constituent identifies most closely on a day to day basis. The fact, though, that certain students are neither particularly well-informed about nor interested in local issues 'should come as no surprise. Often they feel that as transients they have no stake in Kingston: that the AMS serves well the rather self-contained Queen's community.

Kingston residents in the past have revealed a certain resentment that the effect of the Queen's vote was contrary to that of a majority of the local citizenry. In the Provincial election of 1972 the Victoria Hall ballots, which were the last to be counted, were seen as the deciding factor in bringing victory to Conservative Syl Apps as MPP. It was perceived that Queen's had "decided" the outcome of the election for the whole community. (Had the relatively small number of votes been tabulated at an earlier stage. On election night, the Queen's polls might well have gone unnoticed. Still, the resentment was understandable.)

The AMS pursues a policy of encouraging heavy student turnout for local government elections. Although sound in democratic theory, we question the efficacy of having uninformed student influence over the composition of local school boards and civic council. Students are not the well informed, rational and concerned electorate on the local level that they might otherwise be. Students just do not have a vested interest in many issues concerning the community. This is particularly true of the some 2000 students who live in the residence area.

Encouraging a heavy student vote may be a disservice to Kingston.

Socialists and media

Few groups on campus have been as successful as the Socialist at attracting the attention of the students.

Although the socialist crest was short lived, painted as it was on the very prominent corner of Union and University, the public attention which focused on this action achieved the desired result: publicity (one member of the Socialist coalition confided that he was surprised this crest remained intact for 24 hours).

It was only last February that the Socialist added their field of 10 candidates for the 3 executive positions of the AMS. During their campaign they circulated a series of leaflets broaching the various areas of student concern from a socialist perspective. Although unsuccessful in their collective candidacy, their entry in the race provided not only a new dimension to the annual campaign, but also a good deal of public exposure and attention for them.

That the Socialists have so successfully dominated the media is a tribute to the energy with which they express their philosophy.

Given their flair for the creative use of uncommon media, one has to wonder if the Socialists are not also responsible for the raging debates on the campus washroom walls. Thoughtfully expressed, topics range from Soviet and American armaments to student support for organized labour. The classic yet anonymous exchanges, unfortunately, do not survive long as the maintenance men frequently act as moderators and cut off debate. How disappointing it must be to scribble one's crushing rebuttal to the then rejoinder to the original statement only to have one's inspiration scoured off with an abrasive cleanser.

Though the pen is far mightier than the sword we are led to conclude the Spic and Span is supreme.

Project to save the whales

by Trish Crowe

Stirling 'D' was filled to capacity on Tuesday night, with people standing along the walls and sitting on the steps to hear John Bennett, co-ordinator of the Toronto branch of the Greenpeace Foundation, speak on the impending fate of the great whales if commercial whaling continues at its present rate.

The Greenpeace Foundation was initially established in 1971 to oppose American nuclear testing at Amchitka Island. The name "Greenpeace" derives from their desire to live in a world of peace that would, at the same time, be green and healthy. Four years later, its operations expanded to include an anti-whaling campaign, when it became obvious that whales were in danger of extinction.

Two films were presented on Tuesday night, one produced by the CBC, and the second produced by the Greenpeace Foundation. The Voyage of the Greenpeace V portrayed occurrences in the summer of 1975 when Greenpeace people used rubber dinghies to bring public attention to the plight of the great whales by positioning themselves between whaling trawlers and the threatened whales. They succeeded in preventing the death of about six whales, a small number, but one which had immense repercussions. Russian trawlers, off the B.C. coast had been harpooning whales, loading them onto their factory ships, and with the use of modern processing techniques, reducing the whales to commercial fodder in about 30 minutes. After the initial confrontation, it appeared as if the Russians were attempting to avoid further conflict with the anti-whaling groups.

The International Whaling Commission exists to set quotas and guidelines by which commercial whaling may occur. However, the two most powerful members of this commission, Russia and Japan, tend to overrule any of the recommendations made, particularly the recommendation that a 10 year moratorium on whaling be implemented in order to allow the great whales a chance to repopulate. Due to overhunting, the Blue, Fin, Sei, Murke and Sperm whales are a drastically endangered species. As it stands now, one whale dies every 14 minutes, on the average.

It's somewhat ironic that Russia and Japan still account for 85 per cent of all commercial whaling. Only one per cent of total Japanese animal protein is obtained through whale-meat, and it has been determined that synthetic substitutes for all whale products can be made inexpensively. According to John Bennett, "whales are being killed solely for short term economic gain," a purpose which is "sadly lacking."

The Greenpeace Foundation receives no government funding, with the exception of a Canada Council grant given to aid production of their film. They have 29 branch offices throughout Canada and the United States, and as far away as New Zealand and Kenya.

Greenpeace people intend to continue their battle with the commercial whalers, for they believe their methods are proving successful.

Profile Senate reviews student services

by Paul Finkel

The Senate Committee on Student Affairs (SCOSA) developed its present form in an effort to better co-ordinate many of the student services which were scattered throughout the campus. The committee consists of four student and three faculty representatives. The position of chairman alternates the role of "Ombudsman" in the University Community. A voice for students in the Senate, the committee tries to be "receptive to all areas" of student affairs and student life, and as a result "can get involved in quite a variety of issues."

Last year proved to be a busy one for SCOSA involving studies for the Senate on, recommendations presented in the Principal's Report on Financial Constraints, the request by the Athletic Council for increases in athletic fees and assisting in a study of the incidence of rape on campus which resulted in better lighting for certain areas of the university.

When it appeared that a severe housing crisis was developing three years ago, SCOSA implemented a housing pool to prevent houses being vacated by graduating students from passing back into the general Kingston market, thereby reducing their availability to other students. Such action, coupled with publicity campaigns encouraging students to arrange residence accommodations well before September of the approaching school year helped to drastically reduce the severity of the problem.

Some plans of SCOSA for 1976-7 involve investigation of study space on campus, particularly in the Douglas Library and examination of many campus groups to derive inter-relationships in their various endeavours and promote discussion of related activities between them. In past years, no recommendations made to Senate by SCOSA have ever been totally rejected. This, Mr. Bogstad suggested, serves as testimony to the efficiency of the committee and the devotion of its members.

Chris Petrie Memorial prize

A memorial prize is being established by the family and friends of Christopher Petrie (Chem Phys '77, Eng Phys '78) who was accidentally killed this past August.

Christopher had shown keen interest in experimental physics and expected to follow a career in this field. To reflect his interest and intentions, the prize will be awarded to the third-year student who best demonstrates interest and ability in one of the laboratory physics courses available at the third-year level.

Those who wish to make a tax-deductible contribution to the "Christopher Petrie Memorial Prize Fund" should forward their cheques to the Alumni Office of Queen's University.

The Parti Quebecois won a surprise victory in Quebec last Monday, devastating the established Quebec Liberal party.

Graeme Bate (Applied Science '79) felt that his first reaction was one of surprise. "It will be good for the country and for Quebec...it will make everyone make a decision about Quebec and exactly what Canada should do." He felt that the results would not have "a large effect immediately on the political stability of Canada, but it may make people think a lot more about Canada's political system, especially our federal politics." Regarding the referendum, Graeme commented that the Parti Quebecois will "try to get across to the people of Quebec that they could make it on their own. They will try to divorce themselves from being identified with the federal government and they will try to extract more power and concessions from it as well." He concluded with the comment that he doesn't "support separation...they couldn't survive economically as a separate country."

Lonnie Jones

"I feel that the election results were definitely a vote for the Parti Quebecois, as opposed to a vote against the Liberal party. I wasn't shocked on hearing that they had won...it seems ridiculous to have two countries separated by language, history, culture and tradition, without assimilating the minority into the mainstream.

As a result, the question of Quebec's separation has been given legitimacy. CAMPUS COMMENT questioned students

Cindy Hunt

"I was shocked by the thought that we're going to lose a province at a time of repression...at a time when we should be more united." Cindy (Education) felt that "the Liberals are on pretty shaky ground...the results of the election reflect on the federal government too." She "wasn't pleased with the outcome because the other French speaking Canadians located across Canada will be affected. For example, French people living in B.C. will be totally excommunicated." Cindy felt that "most of the people who voted were just sick of the Bourassa government...they voted for a lesser of two evils. However, within two years Levesque could manipulate his position so that he will have gained the trust of the Quebecers, and then they will on their views on the election results, and its implications on both Quebec's and Canada's future.

Glenn Alexander

"As a result of the election, Canada's eyes will be open to Quebec's needs more than they have been in the past...the new blood will probably bring some welcome changes." Glenn (Graduate Studies-Chemistry) wasn't shocked to hear that the Parti Quebecois had won. "They needed a change in the government due to the problems they've had over the past year or two." When asked whether or not he felt that the referendum would pass, Glenn replied "I don't think that it will." He concluded by saying, "This election shows that the government needs some help from the rest of the country to put a little honesty back in the government."

U of T med's change adm. policy

If you've been spending all your time worrying if your marks are good enough to get into medical school, you should set aside a little time to worry about other things.

The original group of 2,500 applicants - all vying for the 250 places in first year at U of T - is narrowed down to about 600 on purely academic merits. The fortunate 250 are then chosen from this group of 600; but this year non-academic standards count for 40 percent in the rating.

Three members of the Admissions

Committee - a student, a faculty member and a non-faculty representative - judge each candidate on the evidence of letters of recommendation and on an autobiography submitted by the candidate. To avoid the affects of any personal bias, another three members review the file. A score is arrived at and then averaged in with the candidate's academic record.

The Admissions Committee reviews the history of the applicant and tries to evaluate whether he has shown some ability to commit himself. This does not necessarily mean that a candidate with hospital work experience will have an advantage.

Although many observers have criticized the stress on academic requirements Llewellyn-Thomas, U. of T.'s Dean of Undergraduate Affairs emphasized that it is "an absolute criterion. It is the nature of the medical profession today that the science component has increased so much, and unless a student has science and math ability, cannot make it as a med student or as a doctor."

Padre on talents and privileges

by Jennifer Warren

"Many of us have no better sense of justice than to pervert it by denying rights and liberties to others and reserving privilege and power for ourselves," Dr. A. M. Lavery pointed out in a lecture given last Tuesday evening. The Padre was the third speaker in the Last Lecture Series: he spoke of the different levels of talent with which men were endowed.

Some are "five talent" people and should be expected to produce five talents, such as Shakespeare or Einstein; others are "one talent" people and should be expected to produce one talent. Dr. Lavery asserted. The speaker suggested that while a talent must be exercised in order that it may grow, it also demands responsibility. If one is a "five talent" person, he or she must use his endowments to be of service to others, the padre said.

Canada, as a country with the second highest standard of living in the world and abounding in natural resources, could be classified as a privileged "five talent" country, Dr. Lavery said. In such a position, and in a world where so many are poor, the Padre expressed the need for our national identity to include a "genuine and generous sharing of our gifts, faithful and open-handed service to others."

Concluding his address, the speaker recounted the answer of a Czech professor, who when asked whether he was free, replied: "...you in the West have a great deal of freedom. What are you doing with it?" Dr. Lavery here was alluding to the "hoarding" of privilege and the ideal that "to be gifted is to give, to be privileged is to share, and to be talented is to be obligated."

Queen's Law faculty requirement explained

by Debra Sigler

At a lecture on "Law as a Career," Toby Goode, a third year law student on the law admission board, cited the admission requirements to the Queen's Law faculty as a minimum of two years university with a B plus average. As well, the results of LSATs are taken into account.

Queen's Law School uses the "LSATs as a back-up factor when considering admissions," says Goode. "Last year the lowest score of those admitted was 550, on a scale from 200-800." More emphasis is placed on grades than on LSATs, and it is the two best academic years that are considered.

Professor Magnusson, Associate Dean of Law says "LSATs measure the aptitude to think logically." They indicate the potential ability to understand law documents, "and the ability to write law exams." The correlation between marks, LSATs and performance in law school, "is highest when both LSATs and marks are taken into account," says Professor Magnusson.

There is no distinction made on the basis of the previous discipline studied on admission to Queen's Faculty of Law. "No studies show any positive or negative correlation between discipline studied, and performance in law school," he said. "Law affects all aspects of life, so whatever background you have is helpful."

The Law Admissions Committee is made up of nine or ten members, four or five of which are students. The committee changes its policy a little each year. Last year the committee was divided into two parts, one of which dealt with special applicants such as mature students, or the physically handicapped. In these cases "the LSATs and grades are not indicative of ability," Professor Magnusson said. "Of some 300 applications received in this category, we accept ten." Other files go to the other half of the committee where "the committee sits around a table and passes the files around. These are piled into accept and reject, till we have decided we have enough, then we go through the outstanding files," Professor Magnusson stated.

When asked about discrimination toward women in law, Goode answered, "there was no discrimination in admissions, fewer women apply, so fewer are admitted." She felt that "problems once in law school arise because the law is male dominated, and material covered is male dominated because judges are male." She also pointed out, "that it is often harder for women to find jobs."

The cut off date for applications to Queen's Faculty of Law is early February and Toby Goode claims that 2000 have already been received. "There is a slight advantage to getting LSAT marks in early," says Professor Magnusson, "because this year we will be looking at registration a little earlier."

Student seeks school trusteeship

by Bob Reynolds

John Campey cites, "accessibility to students and teachers" as one of his top priorities in running for election to the Frontenac County Board of Education.

Although the second year Queen's Politics student is by his own admission unfamiliar with Frontenac County, Campey nonetheless sees the "need for a student viewpoint on boards of education as it is important for them to hear from someone who is going through the system."

Campey aspires to become one of the seven trustees elected to the County School Board from the City of Kingston. Unlike the aldermanic position where candidates are elected by wards, the Education Board Trustees are elected by the community at large. Campey is one of 12 candidates vying for the position.

According to Campey, the position should be of interest to Queen's students as "anyone who rents a house or apartment in Kingston is indirectly paying taxes, a large portion of which go to education." Campey also notes that literacy at Queen's relates directly to elementary and secondary school

by Phil Cheeseman

Bulging cheeks and distorted faces showed the agony endured by participants in the Gordon House First Annual Banana Eating Contest. The event was held on Monday at Leonard Hall and a packed house was on hand to see it.

The idea was to down as many bananas as possible in five minutes. However, the contestants, who had their hands tied behind their backs, did not feed themselves. They were fed by some of Victoria Hall's finest, who were blindfolded.

Dave Donald from 4th Gordon

started the race which was accompanied by an accordionist. The rowdiness of the spectators drowned out the tune, but the audience was told it was appropriate.

In the end, Chris Vyse, from 5th Gordon won by devouring all 15 bananas before time ran out. For this feat, he won a 40-ounce of whiskey. A plaque was presented to 2nd Gordon for the best overall performance.

Needless to say, the contest discouraged some people from eating their meal.

Laval de Quebec - encore instable avec le syndicalisme de prof.

Dans Le Journal de vendredi le 12 novembre, on nous a décrit le peu de succès qu'a eu La Journée nationale des Étudiants, le mardi précédent. On nous a parlé du manque de participation des étudiants de Queens et de l'échec des organisateurs de faire comprendre aux gens de l'extérieur les maux de l'université à l'heure actuelle. Alors qu'on parlait de la pénurie d'argent pour les bourses d'étudiants et des subventions de recherche ainsi que des freins budgétaires au niveau de l'administration elle-même, je crois qu'il serait bon de signaler aux étudiants ontariens la pénible situation dans laquelle se trouvent nos confrères québécois à l'Université Laval qui eux, ont perdu le premier semestre de l'année universitaire 1976-77 pour cause de grève des professeurs.

La montée du syndicalisme dans les universités québécoises a polarisé les opinions au sein des établissements aussi bien que dans le secteur public. A cause des conflits entre une administration sclérosée et centralisatrice d'une part, et des professeurs dits de persuasion gauchiste d'autre part, le climat intellectuel dans beaucoup d'universités au Québec est non seulement à Laval, a sensiblement détérioré. Il semble que la grève à Laval soit basée sur des désaccords entre les professeurs et l'administration en matière de l'établissement d'un régime salarié pour différentes catégories de professeurs (assistant, adjoint, agrégé, titulaire), et le partage de pouvoir entre les facultés et le Conseil d'université.

Pour analyser les affrontements prolongés entre les deux groupes il faut une connaissance approfondie des événements que je ne possède pas.

Tout ce que je peux avancer ici c'est que se sont les étudiants de Laval qui ont sûrement les plus souffert dans ce conflit interminable.

Dans un article publié dans le quotidien montréalais, Le Devoir, au 30 octobre, Louis Méthot, étudiant en sciences politiques à Laval dit: "Au nom de certains principes, on a piétiné le 'monde ordinaire' que sont les étudiants dans le contexte de l'Université. Car bien évidemment ce sont les étudiants seuls parmi les trois groupes intéressés qui n'ont pas les moyens de perdre deux mois de cours. Durant l'automne un certain nombre parmi eux ont élevé la voix contre ces enjeux démesurément coûteux en créant l'organisme RUT (Rassemblement des universitaires tannés!). Le RUT a pour but de sensibiliser l'opinion publique en faveur d'une reprise immédiate des cours.

Espérons vivement que cette organisation puisse exercer une forte pression sur le syndicat et l'administration de Laval afin de recommencer les pourparlers de fa con à mettre fin à cette situation intolérable.

l'union de deux partenaires pour un pays, n'a jamais fonctionné, et le temps est venu pour proposer l'alternative. Est-ce que le Canada est capable de l'accepter?

Trudeau, comme premier ministre du Canada, ne peut qu'empêcher la polarisation des deux points de vue. Il faut à tout pris éviter une réaction qui pourra mener à une guerre civile.

Levesque doit coordonner et même contenir le côté un peu radical de son parti. Il doit éduquer le peuple, et pousser le Québec vers une maturité complète. Il doit travailler surtout sur le point de vue économique; un stratagème québécois, respectant le "Québec pour les Québécois", mais coordonné avec le Canada et les États-Unis.

L'Histoire est en train de se faire. Est-ce que l'indépendance est un fait accompli? Plusieurs gens ne le croient pas. Levesque semble avoir un ultimatum: pousser pour un statut particulier (vraiment devenir le partenaire égal d'une Confédération) à l'intérieur de la Confédération, ou bien l'indépendance. Le Québec a peut-être déjà choisi, mais le reste du Canada a aussi à choisir: traiter une race "co-fondatrice" d'égale, ou bien désintégrer la Confédération.

C. Bourbonnais - MacDonald

La "vague péquiste" a envahi la province de Québec. Ce n'est pas comme en '73 ou en '69; aujourd'hui, être péquiste, c'est être étudiant, ouvrier, docteur, notaire, ou même gérant de compagnie. Ce n'est plus un parti composé de "jeunes fanatiques". C'est un unité, un groupe de gens qui sont enfin arrivés au tournant de la route. Le Québec est à sa maturité, et semble avoir fait sa décision. Le Québec veut une alternative au gouvernement de Bourassa et aussi, la possibilité de choisir l'indépendance.

On est d'accord à choisir notre façon de vivre, de se gouverner". La Confédération de l'Abbé Groulx n'est pas réalisable. Pour le Québec, le pacte,

L'avenir incertain

Comme chacun le sait maintenant le Parti Québécois de Monsieur René Lévesque a remporté la victoire le 15 Nov. dans la belle province. Les Québécois ont élu un gouvernement péquiste majoritaire de 69 sièges. Les Libéraux, qui ont subi une défaite écrasante n'ont réussi à obtenir que 28 sièges à l'Assemblée Nationale. Le tiers parti de Monsieur Rodrigue Biron a remporté 11 sièges, les Crédiatistes n'ont qu'un député d'élu et en dernier lieu, Le Parti National Populaire a eu un député d'élu.

Face à ces résultats décisifs, le Québec a connu le plus grand, le plus important événement politique dans son histoire depuis la dernière guerre. Le Canada entre maintenant dans une période économique et sociale incertaine. L'existence même du pays et le système fédéral tels que nous les connaissons sont maintenant en jeu. C'est un moment de première importance pour les Québécois et pour les Canadiens d'autres origines ethniques.

Cependant, je voudrais rappeler à mes concitoyens d'expression anglaise qu'il serait extrêmement préjudiciable, d'être injuste envers les électeurs de Québec et de sonner le tocsin pour l'avenir de notre pays, dès maintenant. Car les Québécois n'ont pas, selon moi, donné feu vert au Parti Québécois de constituer un état indépendant dans les mois à venir. Ils ont plutôt exprimé leur profond mécontentement avec le gouvernement Bourassa. Il n'est pas sûr, tout de même, que le référendum qui aura lieu d'ici deux ans aux dires du chef du Parti, Lévesque, soit favorable au maintien de la province et au sein du présent système fédéral. Il faut que nous, les Canadiens des deux groupes linguistiques, tenions compte de la possibilité de la séparation du Québec du reste du pays. Mais assurons-nous que Monsieur Lévesque lui-même, ainsi que les personnalités-clés de son organisation, tels que Jacques Parizeau et Claude Morin, sont les hommes intelligents et réfléchis. Je suis persuadée qu'ils ont à cœur les intérêts de la majorité de la population québécoise et qu'ils ont le profond désir de répondre aux besoins de cette population dans toute la mesure de leur possible. Bien sûr que ceci n'écarte point le spectre d'un Canada divisé d'ici quelques années, mais la situation actuelle après les élections provinciales est certainement plus saine qu'auparavant. Maintenant nous ne pouvons pas jouer le rôle de l'autruche dans le contexte actuel. Chacun d'entre nous doit réfléchir sur ce qu'il entend par le Canada et ce qu'il souhaite que son pays devienne. C'est un excellent exercice de réflexion pour nous, les Canadiens, qui parlons trop de notre crise d'identité nationale et qui n'admettons jamais rien de valable. Alors, clamons à tout prix, et entamons des discussions en bonne foi sur les problèmes de réorganisation du pays dans l'avenir. Essayons réellement de communiquer entre nous et de balayer une bonne fois pour toutes la pénible réalité des deux solitudes que nous avons connue jusqu'à présent.

Place D'Armes project could help revitalize

Kingston's downtown core

by Maben Smith

The city of Kingston is indeed a lucky city, but such luck may soon come to an end. Although several recent attempts at developing various parts of the city have been stalled, if not completely checked (Marina City), developers continue to show sustained interest in rather substantial projects. Not the least of these is that of Place d'Armes. This area is adjacent to the LaSalle Causeway, bounded by Wellington and Barrack streets. Mr. Bruce Galloway, President of Kinderlaw Properties has been devoting his full effort towards the initial step for over three years. He has, however, had his full share of setbacks, even though today he remains as hopeful as ever.

There is a great deal to gain for the entire city of Kingston if the proposed Place d'Armes Project is pursued. Included in the plan is a large size hotel, a shopping area—slightly larger than the present Kingston Shopping Centre—a convention centre, three twelve story office towers, apartments, condominiums, senior citizen residences and public parks. Mr. Galloway stresses that the object is not to create a separate shopping complex, but rather to add to the present downtown retail facilities, incorporating the entire area as a "shopping centre". Downtown businesses are in full accord with this proposal, as well as the Kingston Chamber of Commerce.

The major hold up in proceeding with the project is in obtaining some form of assurance from City Hall that Place d'Armes is favoured over development outside of the city's core. Recent acknowledgement by city politicians of their delight in the rejuvenation of certain downtown businesses is helpful according to Galloway, but for a project that will be in excess of fifty million dollars, more concrete support is called for. The success of Kinderlaw attracting large and small retail merchants depends largely on this. So far, both city council and Mayor Speal refuse to grant such a guarantee. Mr. Galloway is not distressed by City Hall's reaction, he says that developers have come to realize that they can not count on the inexperienced members of city council in matters of this regard. Although the planning department is exceptionally capable, the city fathers are not aware of what assistance a large development requires. They have no past knowledge in such situations, failing thereby to support them when support is most needed. In place of this, they develop a mistrust or suspicion of developers who are willing to commit large sums of money. Mr. Galloway feels a simple remedy is for the city council and mayor to examine a few case studies such as those in Quebec City and Peterborough, where municipal cooperation with development firms has revitalized the downtown core.

Further to this, Mr. Galloway emphasizes the importance of a convention centre for the city of Kingston. Both federal and provincial governments have denoted the status of our city in terms of a regional centre. A convention centre, combined with an adequate number of hotel rooms is both feasible and commercially beneficial. Approximately $250 is spent per person in three and one half convention days. This not only creates an advantageous economic climate, Queen's University, in conjunction with the Department of External Affairs, recently sponsored a briefing by two senior NATO officials. The two NATO speakers were Dr. Wigand Pabsch, the Head of the Disarmament and Arms Control Section of the Political Directorate of NATO, and Mr. Eivind Bernal, Chief of Public Information for Allied Forces Northern Command. Both men are very much involved in Mutual Balanced Force Reduction (MBFR), the Strategic Arms Limitations Talks (SALT) and the negotiations on European security that culminated in the Helsinki Agreement.

In an interview with Journal reporters, Mr. Bernal attempted to expand on some of the more critical issues that NATO faces with respect to the military balance in Europe. According to Mr. Bernal, little or no progress has been made in the three years of Mutual Force Reductions Talks. Mr. Bernal stressed that detente merely signifies a relaxing of international tension. It does not, by definition, mean that fundamental problems have been solved—only that the atmosphere has improved for problem solving. MBFR and SALT cannot restructure military balance in aid of improved political relations. NATO has sought to persuade the Warsaw Pact to reduce its forces so that a common ceiling of 700,000 men would be attained. Present figures according to Mr. Bernal place Warsaw Pact forces at 925,000 troops, compared to a combined force of 770,000 NATO troops. He also stressed that the Warsaw Pact has a three to one advantage over NATO in main battle tanks in the Central Region. However, Mr. Bernal emphasized that the heavy burden on the Soviet economy of maintaining such a large military force is as much as 13 percent of the Russian G.N.P. It is therefore, clearly in the Kremlin's interest to reduce to some extent its military expenditure.

A possible future crisis facing NATO countries Mr. Bernal continued, is the imminent death of Yugoslavia's Premier Tito. Mr. Bernal stressed that there existed a severe danger of a Soviet attempt to impose its hegemony on this independent communist country. The structure of power in Yugoslavia at the moment is solely dependent on Tito's rule. Should the Soviets intervene in this situation, there is the distinct possibility that a united Yugoslavian nation would attempt to repel any such move. This might trigger a more widespread confrontation between the Warsaw Pact countries and NATO. The hope is therefore for a conclusion reached at within the Yugoslavian realm.

6000 extra jobs

says CMC Prairies

"Anyone who says the couldn't get a job in Winnipeg in the summer is either a fool or a liar," a spokesman for the federal department of manpower said.

Roger Garrity, the regional co-ordinator for summer student employment and activities for all three prairie provinces, last summer said that the department had over six thousand jobs in the prairie provinces that were not filled. "We couldn't get people to take these jobs. While they might have been minimum wage jobs, most students are minimum skill employees."

In Manitoba, 14,207 secondary and post-secondary students registered with Canada Manpower, and of those, 6,546 were placed by that organization. Of those, Garrity said that 900 would be of a more casual nature that last no more than a week.

The Youth Secretariat, which is a branch of the provincial department of continuing education and manpower received 100,000 job applications last summer, and was able to place 3,700 students.

A spokesman for the Youth Secretariat said that they had hoped to increase the number of students that they hired, but were caught by the government imposed restraint program.

"What is the White Cross?"

How would you like to be parachuted into a new and hostile environment and be expected to fend for yourself? Chances are, you'd want some friends to help you adjust.

This isn't the beginning of a fairy tale. This is what happens when fellow human beings are released from mental institutions and expected to adapt immediately. Just like you, a discharged mentally-ill patient welcomes the chance to get together with friends.

Thanks to the St. George's Cathedral White Cross Group, Kingston's out-patients are able to do just this. Whether for arts & crafts, chess, bingo or any other one of the activities dreamed up, these evenings are very much looked forward to.

For all this to function, and money are needed: volunteers and money. Anyone interested in giving only one evening a week to this cause should phone Mrs. Coleman at 546-4392 (or 547-6189 from 2 to 5 on Tuesdays and Thursdays). As for the money, you give to the White Cross Group when you give to the United Way.

Sprays harm ecology...

Beyond budworms

by Paul Dalle-Molle

I recently came across a magazine article which struck me as one of the best-written pieces I had ever read. The article was concise, lucid, and eminently readable. I encourage everyone to read this article. Please do not be turned away by the apparently esoteric topic, the (don't laugh) spruce budworm.

The article is entitled "Why Aerial Spraying Against Spruce Budworms Should be Banned in the Maritimes", and it is printed in the June 1976 issue of Science Forum. The authors give a well-reasoned, factual account of a problem which affects many Canadians and Americans.

What intrigues me most about this piece—that which gives it a relevance far greater than that of its specific topic—is that it illuminates an ecological microcosm in such a way as to give insight into the dynamics of all other organisms and life-systems. There is an especially profitable lesson to be learned from the spruce budworm about human interaction with the rest of the earth's ecosystem.

I would like to summarize and paraphrase some of the conclusions of these two engineer-authors, Chris Bailey and Neal Benneworth. The spruce budworm is an integral part of the ecosystem of northeastern North America. Natural bio-control factors stabilize the spruce budworm and the other organisms with which it interacts. Occasionally there is a coincidence of favorable weather and abundant fir and spruce forests which lead to a dramatic increase in the budworm population. These periodic population bursts allow less-competitive species of trees to survive.

From 1969 to 1976 there has been one of these periodic outbreaks of the spruce budworm. The forest industry responded with attempts to save the spruce and balsam fir forests by aerial spraying, which is "an energy-intensive attempt to bend nature to conform to the forest industry's narrow concepts of how a forest should behave."

Spraying protects foliage but does not kill budworms; preservation of the trees increases the likelihood of further budworm population expansion and, worse, creates ecosystem-instability. Spraying has unknown side-effects on other life-forms in the system: a comprehensive environmental impact study is necessary. There may be, however, one blatant human impact. "there are indications that the dispersal agents used...are linked to a fatal disease in children." This is the mysterious Reye's syndrome.

This information is reminiscent of other examples of the failure of men to appreciate, and live within, nature's dynamics. Over-fishing in the North Atlantic; oil spills in Arctic waters; raw sewage disposal in the St. Lawrence system, and in fresh-water lakes; automobile and industrial air pollution; all are parts of a seemingly endless list of human disrespect for the complex interdependencies of the earth. When will men learn from these examples?

It seems obvious that short-term gains from human disruption of natural ecosystems are in no way worth the long-term imbalances.

One marvelous human ability is that of conscious flexibility. It is truly inhuman of us not to be able to (and willing to) design the Maritime forestry economy to live within natural parameters. Just as in Hermann Hesse's Siddhartha, where the river teaches all that men must know, so too do we have the spruce budworm.

Pequistes, patriation and referendum -- now what?

by Fraser Bliss

The election of a separatist government in Quebec has rendered uncertain the "Constitutional Question." There are present-day forces which are advocating the constitution's amendment and patriation. In theory, these are sensible ends; in practice, their implications are far from certain. At this point in time, indeed for the next four years, it would be politically expedient to press the present constitutional negotiations to their logical conclusion.

In the absence of extenuating circumstances, the present negotiations can expect to be protracted and quarrelsome. With the volatile Quebec scene, an unintentional "spark" from these negotiations could very well be the undoing of federalism.

The question Quebecers will ultimately have to face ought not to be complicated by the "apparent" discord emanating from these conferences. These federal-provincial talks would best serve the interests of Canadians if they were postponed until the situation in Quebec stabilized. Indeed, if separation were to become a reality, constitutional change would be inevitable, thus negating the effect of any interim constitutional agreements.

In light of the given Canadian realities, one can rationalize the appropriateness of the present constitutional arrangement. The Constitution has had the benefit of one hundred and nine years of "maturing" experience during which it proved both flexible and adaptable. It encountered its share of impass along the way, but even-industry responded with attempts to save the spruce and balsam fir forests by aerial spraying, which is "an energy-intensive attempt to bend nature to conform to the forest industry's narrow concepts of how a forest should behave."

Spraying protects foliage but does not kill budworms; preservation of the trees increases the likelihood of further budworm population expansion and, worse, creates ecosystem-instability. Spraying has unknown side-effects on other life-forms in the system: a comprehensive environmental impact study is necessary. There may be, however, one blatant human impact. "there are indications that the dispersal agents used...are linked to a fatal disease in children." This is the mysterious Reye's syndrome.

This information is reminiscent of other examples of the failure of men to appreciate, and live within, nature's dynamics. Over-fishing in the North Atlantic; oil spills in Arctic waters; raw sewage disposal in the St. Lawrence system, and in fresh-water lakes; automobile and industrial air pollution; all are parts of a seemingly endless list of human disrespect for the complex interdependencies of the earth. When will men learn from these examples?

It seems obvious that short-term gains from human disruption of natural ecosystems are in no way worth the long-term imbalances.

One marvelous human ability is that of conscious flexibility. It is truly inhuman of us not to be able to (and willing to) design the Maritime forestry economy to live within natural parameters. Just as in Hermann Hesse's Siddhartha, where the river teaches all that men must know, so too do we have the spruce budworm.

A Voice from the Cloister

by Margaret Churcher, Queen's Senator

Is a university education really worthwhile? Over the past few weeks this question has been bandied around so much that it has become a cliché and hence has not received the attention it deserves.

One of the first questions which people pose when talking about the worth of a university education is that of its relevance, both to the development of the student as an individual and to society which is footing most of the costs. Relevance is actually a poor term to apply to a university education since most students do not merely take courses related solely to job preparation but, in addition, pursue interests totally unrelated to their future careers.

However, relevance is an important aspect of a university education in the sense that people attend university not just in order to acquire meaningless facts in isolation but rather to develop a critical and thoughtful attitude towards all sorts of information and problems. It is obvious that with the enormous explosion in the amount of information in any given field and the constant revision of much of that information, the mere acquisition of knowledge in a specific area of expertise is really of little long-term value to either the student or society.

If we agree that the primary objective of the university is to develop and foster critical thinking, we must then pursue the matter further and ask if this is in fact what is happening. I think not, except in a few rare instances. I believe that the lecture system, which is the main teaching method employed, has a great deal to do with this problem.

By its very nature it encourages students to passively and mindlessly soak up facts like sponges, facts which are then wrung out at examination time and subsequently forgotten. It encourages professors to cover material already present in the assigned texts of the course, material which should be analyzed and talked about in different perspectives rather than just being summarized as far as the basic facts are concerned.

Above all, the lecture system does the most damage by putting the lecturer into the role of giver of information, the student into the role of recipient and in so doing discourages any interaction between these two people. How can such a system possibly foster the critical thinking which the university claims is its function? How can the university, i.e. students, professors and administration, permit such an untenable situation to exist?

I believe that given this state of affairs there are only two real alternatives open to the university: (1) getting rid of the lecture system entirely and following the British system of independent readings and assigned tutors; or (2) modifying the lecture system as it presently exists. The latter seems to be the most tenable of the two suggestions.

By modification all that is meant is that students would be made aware of readings which would have to be done in advance of each lecture since the basic facts covered in the text would not be specifically covered during lecture time. Instead a professor would pursue the implications of those facts, analyze them and thus, by example, hopefully foster critical thinking. In addition, a student would be strongly urged to put forth their own ideas and criticism of what they had read and the entire class might be structured upon this student input with guidelines from the professor.

Perhaps this sounds implausible for any of the large first year classes but I don't really think so. Again, basic material could be covered in readings and then the tutorial sections, which characterize most first year courses could take the place of the lecture time with the added benefit of reducing the number of students to a manageable size.

It may be argued that this alternative to the present system of university education is very unrealistic. However, can we as students afford to do anything else?

Change is justified only when it can demonstrably be shown that some benefit is thereby gained. At this juncture, no benefit is so wholly obvious to warrant the risk.

The enigma of the Presidency

by Brian Green

The flush of excitement still lingers from November 2nd. And in the aftermath of the Presidential election—in this bicentennial year—it seems a singularly appropriate time for a few personal observations on the Presidency in general.

The way in which Americans perceive their President is so particularly and typically "American" that it is at once both humorous and revelatory. Humorous, because to Canadians the patriotic excesses of our southern neighbours always seem to inspire a condescending shrug of bewilderment, a smiling indulgence, and maybe too—just a tinge of envy at their flatulent, uninhibited loyalty to the symbols and cherished myths that are the stuff of that patriotism. Revelatory, because the near-identification of the Presidency illuminates not only the American psyche, but our own as well. For in it, one detects a persistent, almost universal, human urge.

Humorous patriotic loyalty

The President is empowered by the constitution with a virtual monopoly on the executive branch of government. But even that sort of political suzerainty hardly seems to justify the awe he evokes and the tremendous aura of power he exudes. Canadians, as a rule, don't really understand this special fascination of the Presidency for our neighbours. There is no obvious counterpart in the parliamentary system, where the focus of power is blurred by Cabinet and, in a very real sense, shared by the entire government side. Too, our own politicians are hardly the stuff of legend. John MacDonald had no cherry trees handy, and probably would have been too besotted to wield the axe anyway. In contrast to Washington's heroic pose, I somehow suspect that MacDonald would have lost his unsteady footing in the rowboat and sunk unresisting to the bottom of the Delaware, clutching his favourite bottle faithfully to his heart. Prime Minister Trudeau hardly lends that the title invests him with any exalted immunity from criticism—even from within his own Cabinet. And how many ex-Presidents are so savagely repudiated by their party faithful as was Diefenbaker in the late sixties?

The trouble is that Americans sometimes fail to distinguish between the Presidency itself—a seductively fabricated montage of myth and legend, an amalgam of all the truly great men who have aspired to it in the past; of all those who have endowed it with the legacy of their own greatness—and the President, the man—who is at best custodian of that powerful mystique for a time. I suppose that Richard Nixon was really the victim of a classical sort of hubris: he forgot that the office transcends the individual. And once alerted to the near-subversion of their cherished concept, a public that had resolutely deferred to the President's protestations of innocence was as relentlessly hounding the man from public life. The fact that the Presidency itself survived the purge of Richard Nixon attests to that fundamental separation of the man and the office, and explains why the esteem of the Presidency can endure despite bad Presidents.

Perhaps, though, the American experience is not so unique. In the fierce, unforgiving republicanism of America, in the emasculation of all of the pomp and panoply of power, the ceremony and mystery of royal prerogative, her founders somehow failed to eliminate the need for these things. In Britain, we see that human foible most clearly manifest: her subjects still harbour a passionate, personal loyalty to the Queen, and evince an undiminished fascination with all of the royal goings-on. Rather than resenting her immense wealth and envying the perquisites of the monarchy, the vast majority of Britons are determined to preserve those vicarious pleasures they derive from the Royal Family. And numerous other constitutional monarchies are as devoted to their Royal Houses as are the British. It is unimportant whether it is the reassuring paternalism, the sense of continuity and tradition, or just the pageantry and the titillating gossip that keep these anachronistic institutions in demand. What is important is the universality of the phenomenon. And Americans—no less immune than are the rest of us—have simply fashioned from the Presidency a surrogate monarchy. The deference, the almost regal perquisites of office, even the investiture in one man of such vast powers are all expressions of a human need that politics alone is so pathetically unable to satisfy.

"a surrogate monarchy"

Part of the fall-out of Watergate has been a deluge of hasty morals and self-righteous sermonizing. We may yet have to await the more judicious perspective of history to fully assess its impact on the American political system. For some, it has re-affirmed their faith in the vaunted "checks-and-balances" of the constitution. Others of a more cynical bent have been unable to see past the deeply ingrained corruption the scandal exposed. But what really upset both realists and idealists alike—it seems to me—was the debasement of the Presidency by the deceit and mistrust that emanated from the Oval office. If anything, more Americans were shocked by the tapes because of the foul language they heard than by any revelations of actual wrong-doing.

confers a kind of greatness

Mr. Nixon's defenders were not so much loyal to the man himself as they were to the office; or, more precisely, to their sense of its inviolability. As if the status of the Presidency itself conferred upon its occupant some small measure of its own greatness, as if the man himself were exalted by the office, enjoyed some mystical liaison with his predecessors there. The self-seeking opportunism of politics should not—could not—touch the President; after all, has nothing more to seek than his place in history. And the indignation of many of Nixon's supporters toward his detractors was catalyzed—in the painfully slow realization of his complicity in Watergate—to a backlash of unprecedented hostility. Those who two years earlier had handed the Republican nominee the most lopsided victory ever in Presidential politics vindicated his degradation of the office and their sense of betrayal with impeachment, with unalloyed pleasure in Nixon's personal humiliation.

For the President enjoys a term of only four years, while the Presidency has endured for 200. In the collectivity of the American psyche, men like Lincoln and Jefferson are lionized and revered without equal. Children are admonished by their example; parents invoke these mystical names like talismans in christening their offspring "George Washington Brown" or "Franklin Delano Roosevelt Jones." Washington and his apocryphal cherry tree, FDR and his embattled congress, Kennedy and his promise of Camelot; such is the stuff of legends. And we all know too well the awesome power of the American myth-making machine.

The most fascinating aspect of the American attitude to the Presidency is this essential dichotomy. In the final analysis, no American ever fails to make the careful distinction between the President himself and the office he holds. Nowhere has that been more evident than in the aftermath of Watergate.

The fact that Ford set out to run a campaign on the single premise of having restored faith and integrity to the Presidency—and almost succeeded—is illuminating in itself. Ford's carefully calculated effort to "look Presidential" was amazingly well-received. Rose Garden news conferences against the conspicuous backdrop of the White House gave the incumbent an immense psychological advantage. And Carter had to toe a hazardous semantical tightrope whenever he criticized his opponent, ever mindful that an attack on Mr. Ford was never to be construed as an attack on President Ford.

There may, too, be a simple explanation for Carter's dramatic nose-dive in the popularity polls as the campaign progressed. For to seem too hungry for office, to pursue it with such blatant desire, is somehow to besmirch the Presidency itself. Carter, with his suspiciously "lean and hungry look", contravened a fundamental verity of American politics, the unwritten law that aspirants to office of any sort must disguise their ambition with an almost reluctant indifference, with unstinting paeans to "public service" and "civic duty". It seems reasonable to infer from Carter's unexpectedly narrow margin of victory that his single-minded determination profoundly disturbed a lot of American voters. But Jimmy Carter is now President Carter, and the somnolent little town of Plains is now the hottest tourist mecca in the land.

the enigma compels us

Perhaps, though, what is most significant about the Presidential race was the surprising turn-out at the polls. In an election where the candidates were not nearly so polarized as they have been in recent years, where the issues were so vague and empty platitudes so rife, and where strict spending laws severely restricted all of the traditional hoopla and colour of the campaign, Americans still demonstrated their undiminished concern about the man who occupies the Oval Office. But even more intriguing was our own fascination with the election. Canadians don't just enjoy the theatricality and entertainment of election night. It isn't just another horse race or a slightly bizarre version of Monday Night Football. No, it is the enigma of the Presidency itself that compels us to watch the tangible power of the man who occupies the Oval Office, and the mystical power that resides in the White House—the power of tradition and myth and ceremony that is the Presidency itself.

sign of the times

This has been a quiet decade. I have no complaints about this but many people regard it as a slip into dormancy after the fabulous sixties, a dull after rather than before the storm. It might be more realistic to see it as an awakening from a nightmare; hindsight often comes with rose coloured glasses. One of the problems we do have is the lack of an immediate myth or mini-culture to identify with, to use an overburdened cliché. The results are things like greaser dances. Recent school years have been infested with rock 'n' roll revivals and the market is flooded with books and movies about the fifties. I frankly don't know where I was in '62.

Many people don't realize that the fifties were just as complacent as the seventies. What right have they to be glorified just because a few people decided to break the monotony by going to drive-in movies and hamburger stands? This question has a corollary. How will people look upon the seventies after the requisite twenty year period has elapsed?

I was wondering about this as I drifted off to sleep the other night. I had a very vivid dream. I dreamed it was 1996 and I was sitting in my favourite armchair watching a TV show called "Space: 3001." In this episode, a group of astronauts, having conquered all known planets, are sneaking up behind God in their space cruiser. It was a delicate maneuver but they wanted credit for the first photographs. The show was based on some fictitious story by Howard Smith.

Surveying more of my dream, I found that I was a belching 50 years old, up to my knees in cigarette butts. As I watched my lat stomach spill over the arms of the chair, I was reminded of how I buried the cynicism of my college days, settling permanently in Kingston. I became a landlord.

My two teenage sons, Spiro and Bing, named after my childhood heroes, came in to say good-night. They were on their way to a dance at Queen's. They needn't have bothered because I was planning to stay up in order to satisfy myself that they weren't bringing any girls home.

Spiro and Bing were excited because the dance offered their favourite theme. It was a 1970's revival dance. They had been preparing for it all week long. This meant putting aside the traditional student uniform of 1996, surgeon's shirts and judges robes. You see, in the 1980's the faculties of law and medicine expanded in response to student pressure. By 1996 these faculties were over ten times the size of the faculty of Arts and Science, and most kids go about in surgeon's shirts and judges robes. But for the 1970's revival, my sons had to don the traditional student uniform of 1976. This took some doing. All week they scoured abandoned farms, checked gas stations, bribed house painters and kidnapped construction workers and baseball players to get what they needed.

Bing wore overalls over a striped rugger shirt, sandals and a bulldozer operator's baseball hat. Spiro wore painter's pants, climbing boots and an orange knapsack full of books on his back. Both wore pins which read "I skied Lake Placid" and both were perched on antiquated ten-speed bikes. In keeping with the theme, the dance was being held in the Queen's velodrome.

Having lived through the '70's, I felt sorry for them as they went out the door. It was a dormant decade. Apathy was given tenure at Queen's and one of our major pastimes was to remind each other, usually by scribbling on washroom walls, that there was still much to be done in the world besides write LSAT exams, (i.e. boycott grapes, defy wage controls, clean up washroom walls.)

Actually, the dormancy of the '70's could be found on any campus in North America. Haunted parking lots and the ashes of old ROTC buildings where, in the sixties, flags and draft cards were burned and violent confrontation often obscured the moral issues students were fighting for. If you visited these spots in the seventies, you would find students lecturing each other on how to keep their credit ratings up while janitors plastered garbage cans with posters designed to encourage students to use litter containers. What did these posters say? "Pigs on Campus," that's what they said.

What about Queen's? It was called the "quiet campus" and still is, which is surprising since it is located in that great cultural crossroad called Kingston. A friend of mine attended Carleton but preferred to be known as an ex-Queen's student. He tried to start a branch of the "Students for a Democratic Society" here in 1976. He would discuss it at parties but the most enthusiastic response he got was "shut-up, I'm trying to pick up that girl." Things did pick up though. In 1976 a titanic moral struggle over Suzy-Q week and crest painting took place. I read about it. I felt involved.

But as I was saying, dormancy was everywhere in the '70's. My generation was destined to reach the age of majority in the intermission following the social orgasm of the sixties. It is only natural that things should drift a bit. Perhaps the most revealing sign of the times took place in the 1976 American presidential election. Gerald Ford, a former member of the Warren Commission, selected Robert Dole as his vice presidential running mate in order to make sure he would not be assassinated.

My reverie within a reverie was interrupted by the return of my sons, Spiro and Bing.

"Gee Dad, we didn't realize you had such great dances in the seventies," said Bing. "I wasn't aware we did," I replied, repressing nightmarish visions of synchronized disco dancing in the pub Friday afternoons. As it turned out, Bing was referring to living.

"The seventies had some great groups," said Spiro. "Really?" I said, my mind spinning to "Disco Duck" and David Bowie ("Rebel rebel, your face is a mess.") I was wrong again however. Spiro proceeded to list all the great groups of the seventies and it is with this catalogue that I shall leave you. Are you ready? Here goes The Beach Boys, Chuck Berry, Bill Haley and the Comets, Sha na na.

Essays and other stuff

Now that most midterms are over, essays are due. The idea of essay writing, whereby Joe Student (note: not Joe College - he's too busy chasing Susie-Q) has to learn everything a course has to offer in the first three months of classes and has to display this knowledge in 1200 words or less is merely indicative of a student's confidence, not to mention the student's confidence, not to mention the student's confidence, not to mention the student's confidence. I think about it. Here we are in the eighth week of classes and understanding, most pros wish to know if we've learned anything at all. What more logical way to do this than through assigning essays? Tests are seen to be psychologically flattering - essays are just as bad, but much more subtle. Most arts courses for example would have required at least one essay to date, and, speaking as an artist, the essay topics offered are real winners.

The very physical appearance of an essay seems to be as important as the content. One of my profs for an English course wants at least one of the essays written during the year to be handed in untaped (ie. in the student's own handwriting), because, as he explains, "typing conceals the personality." Hmmm. And I always thought that pass or fail marks were determined by the old "throwing the essays down the stairs and the first one to reach the bottom is the best" method. Not so, obviously. One of the guys in this class disagreed with the prof's reasoning, claiming that his typing certainly didn't conceal his personality.

The choice of topics presented for discourse usually is the most uninteresting element of the art of essay writing. I can tell you all you'll ever wanted to know about the role of the Australian aboriginal in the modern Australian city, or about the manifestation of evil in D. D. Lawrence's "Snake", or all about the Marquis de Sade and why he isn't the nasty person he has always been portrayed as being. What knowledge eh? My parents are constantly amazed at all the new and wonderful things I'm learning at university. There must be a better way of displaying the knowledge one does or does not acquire at university, but I'm damned if I know what it is. At any rate, I'll keep on ibid-ing and op-citing until a better alternative appears.

"I'd clobber you with my purse"

Dear Editor:

I couldn't refrain from writing the following letter in response to Howard Smith.

I would like to clobber you over the head with my purse. You'd really like that, wouldn't you? Honestly now, with "God never lived" one issue and "Virginity's a social disease" the next, what else have you got up your sleeve to keep your imaginary old bats on fire? "Rape is a social remedy"? This time I actually had to look you up in the Who's Where in order to find out whether you're for real. Third year law, huh? Well, all I can do is bop you over the head and feel sorry for you (or is pity out of date too?).

Did you ever think that that young lady whom you quoted as saying, "I want to save it for my husband", actually meant "I haven't found anyone I feel like doing it with yet, thank you very much"? And perhaps she won't feel like "doing it" until she has met someone in whom she finds certainty, security, and love, which are traditionally elements of a marital relationship, something which occurs once in one's lifetime, ideally. Perhaps she is wary of a transient relationship in which emotions are most apt to quickly take over and someone ends up hurt.

I know that premarital virginity is by no means synonymous with respectability today. I agree with you that "In the modern era the importance of virginity per se as a pre-condition to a marriage offer is declining..." (My gracious, you talk like a bloody machine!) But I don't agree that the contemporary "used model" can be a matter of numbers. Nor do I agree that people should be encouraged to "explore these horizons" as spontaneously as eating hamburgers. If virginity is less

"I'd appreciate a virgin husband"

Dear Editor:

Re: Virginity (Howard Smith, Q1, Nov. 12) You seem to forget that this "social disease", as you call it, is a very personal problem influenced by moral and religious values. Perhaps you will at least acknowledge that there is some reason behind "waiting" after listening to my point of view.

substantial today, respectability, I should hope has not gone downhill. But how much harder it is to be respectable when one has lost one's self-respect. And how much easier it is to lose self-respect by participating in one of those heavy relationships that go around these days and finding yourself giving all you know how to give, bursting into tears, kissing someone's foot and being rejected. Only then, Mr. Smith, does one know what it is like to feel like a piece of property lumped together with a sprayed pet, a mare, a '76 model and some kind of potato. Alternatively, it is almost as easy to lose self-respect by having to explain to someone in tears who has given you all they know how to give, that you're calling off the relationship because you might find a better offer somewhere else.

I'm not saying that these things wouldn't happen without the sex, but I do think sex gets the emotions involved more quickly, without thinking, without reason. Although morals may have loosened today, the subconscious and instinctive, if not conscious, need to make such a relationship long lasting, or permanent can hardly be conquered. Is it worth finding out it was all worth it in the end at the risk of becoming miserable or making someone else so? Is it worth fighting "taboos" by which one was raised, pretending they aren't there? Or is it worth fighting one's natural inclinations? I don't know right now how these questions should be answered but at least they should be asked. For the time being I'll amuse myself by clobbering you over the head with my purse.

I believe that sexual intercourse is the ultimate gift given by a man and a woman to each other. It is the deepest expression of love that can be given to another person. It is an experience shared between two people intensely committed to one another. Along with all its other fringe benefits, it is also something sacred.

Readers react: Virginity's not a "social disease" - Howard take note

Dear Editor:

This letter is meant to shed light from a different angle on the subject covered by Mr. Howard Smith, The Journal, Nov. 19, 1976. Unfortunately being a person who is very self-conscious I could never stand having everyone, and his or her pet gerbil, knowing that I wrote this so please accept this without a John Doe.

To start off on a passive note I generally agree with Mr. Howard that virginity as a prerequisite for marriage just because the "new model" is (or is not) sexist. On the other hand, I think that some people (yes even an) save their virginity for the night with other reasons in mind follows is only my opinion on a few generalities. The path of wander but that is only because I am meaning some people apply to sex and you get a very important step in life.

It becomes quite easy now for me to see why someone would want to share their first experience in sex with a person whom they love very much and expect to spend the rest of their life with.

At about this time cries of "Why not just live together", arise. My cop out is Combine this "first time" idea with the meaning some people apply to sex and you get a very important step in life.

It becomes quite easy now for me to see why someone would want to share their first experience in sex with a person whom they love very much and expect to spend the rest of their life with.

At about this time cries of "Why not just live together", arise. My cop out is that many people like me, are very insecure and the institution of marriage is a source of stability.

A gaping hole in this theory at the moment is the explanation of the adage, "most men don't wait while women do". I am going to take many shots to try and plug this hole one, I think more men than actually let on, save their virginity and two, more women cherish their first time than men because in general, their upbringing makes them more sentimental (Did someone yell chauvinist pig?)

To cut off quickly I repeat this is the only reason for keeping virginity and no one in the world may agree with it but I don't really care. I would rather explore sex with someone whom I really love and could share the memories with (Isn't getting there half the fun?)

Howard; your credo ignores fear

Dear Editor:

Howard Smith's article, "Virginity's a Social Disease", is an apt description of a current condition that many deplore and few understand. This issue of virginity has, perhaps a great deal in common with an issue that has recently been examined in the press, the issue of men and women meeting each other and allowing each other to be merely human with all the frailties, insecurities, and clumsiness attendant upon that state.

All of us have been or will be, I think, touched by the issue of virginity at some time or other in our lives. Virginity's loss is more than a loss of physical intactness; it is a moment of discovery in which you reveal yourself to another person. As such it is a personal act and it can only disturb or alarm someone if he or she tries to deal with this act according to one credo or another.

However, because of fears and insecurities, this is precisely what people do; people have developed or borrowed or inherited certain patriotisms or credos with which they deal with the crisis of virginity and its loss. Proclaiming your liberation in this matter is like getting up the courage to go out and do something that you are afraid to do. "Liberation" has nothing more to do with overcoming virginity than that. We don't need history to tell us that people have been using methods to arouse their courage for centuries that had not the slightest thing to do with the act that they needed that courage to do. Reserving virginity till marriage is just a method of explaining your retreat from the circumstances surrounding virginity's loss. Each of these two credos, liberation and abstinence, is artificial; neither expresses the feelings of the person who has chosen to enter the breach or to retreat from it. A credo is a rationalization and not a true understanding.

The most that Howard can do with those two girls is to make it impossible for them to maintain the credo: Virginity till Marriage. Because they can't defend this credo in the light of Howard's feminist-liberalism, they will have to abandon it. Try out "I just haven't met the right man yet". Can your list rhetoric defeat this plea?

No it can't, because the rationalization built of the credo is your argument: "Do your own thing, listen to your own vibes" in a manner these girls might not rationalize Howard can't. But is this rationalization reason they haven't as yet to the breach? No way. They haven't done so yet in the past they had before Howard attacked, and sank for all, their virginity till marriage rationalization. This real reason expressed in three little words, fear, fear, fear.

People grasp at credos in their irrational fears to help themselves bear no real relation to the real anxieties they you, Howard, "Yes, I understand the terror of virginity!"

If you're like the rest of us, that is the last thing you want to hear, because, if people are about revealing their innermost another, they are even more about witnessing someone else (if not very unique) fears. Irrationality can be one of the things two people can share. Sexual intercourse is only an example of our society's general fear of the irrational. It is very of the society in the guise of virginity nightmares about being public with your pants off.

Let he who is without a first column, ex Howard?

would, for one, be very apt to a "would-be" husband" and chosen to wait.

Virginity shouldn't be a matter of marital worth - but that's how you view marriage, isn't it? To share some fifty-odd years with a person, you're going to share some fifty-odd years with someone you know far more about anyone else. I'd rather share that close to me.

Anon.

Virginity is justified by "a gut feeling" but not a rationale

Dear Editor:

I hope you will excuse the fact that I failed to type this letter. Unfortunately my blasted typewriter started complaining of overwork and mailed itself to Palm Springs. That last essay on Marxism must have sunk in.

This letter is not a treatise on recalcitrant typewriters, but a small note in approval of the views put forward in "Virginity is a social disease" by Howard Smith, a man for whom I have great respect and who I sincerely hope has an opportunity to read my ramblings. The letter is here rewritten as I doubt even John M. Allegro could have deciphered the original hieroglyphics.

In his article "Virginity is a social disease," Mr. Smith has touched on an issue which has been too often confined to the scholarly musings of psychologists and the sexual behavioralists. Hence I, a layman to the field, should like to humbly advance my views on the matter.

I see virginity in women today (and in using the word "women" I assume a stage of physical maturity has been reached whereat sexual activity can be both a physically and emotionally gratifying experience) as the product of two interrelated factors. Firstly, a genuine fear of the unknown and what consequences may arise in its wake. Secondly, a result of prevalent social attitudes, i.e. the double standard, the idea of woman as property, male domination in the "mating game", parents and so on.

As regards the first point, I am perhaps foolish to restrict myself to "fear of the unknown". The argument might be made easier with the qualification "fear of unknown consequences" allowing me to infringe on the subject matter of my second argument. Yet the original phraseology serves a specific purpose in that, the argument can be more easily extended to both sexes. The fear of rejection, of inadequacy, of not really knowing what to do in one's first copulatory (copulative?) experience, partially offsets the inquisitive nature of man.

I want liberation not obligation

Dear Editor:

To liberate is to set free, to unchain. In "Virginity is a Social Disease" (12-1176) that status was characterized as one imposed on women by men as yet another shackle which restrains womanhood. The raison d'être of that status was argued to be men's property concept of womanhood, a woman who has sex before marriage becoming a "used model."

In her letter of reply, Wendy Logan asserts that the foregoing theory is really disguised chauvinism and a regression to an "adolescent concept of a sexual free for all." She further contends that it was the article's purpose to replace "enforced virginity" with "enforced promiscuity."

Insofar as Ms. Logan suggests "enforced promiscuity" is objectionable, I wholeheartedly dissent with her in this conclusion. Nevertheless, the article did never advocate enforced promiscuity, and in suggesting that it did, Ms. Logan underscores her failure to appreciate an important distinction. There is a difference between a freedom to act and a recommendation to act. It is one thing to say "Ladies you are free to screw anything in sight without fear of repercussions." It is quite another to say "Ladies you must screw anything in sight." The former goes to a woman's liberty to act, the latter is a mandate to act.

Ms. Logan has revealed herself as a woman who values sex as something other than a mere physical thrill. She says "making love" refers to an act of sharing that necessitates a growth in trust between two people." She further states "to me, a person who puts sex on the same level as hamburgers is immediately suspect." By these contentions she has classified the sex act as it suits her - but is one to take it that these values must apply to all of us?

Does Ms. Logan have any more right to tell women what sex must be than do men anticipating a search for a marital partner? How is it to any different for Ms. Logan to say sex must be confined to mutual love than it is for men to suggest it must be confined to marriage? The heart of the issue is a woman's liberty to evaluate sex for herself irrespective of what it means to Ms. Logan or prospective husbands with a "new model" in mind.

Sex can be different things to different people, from making love to making business. Whatever it is to a woman, "Virginity is a Social Disease" was meant to allow that she is free to make the decision for herself untrammelled by misguided notions that she is or will be somebody's property.

Howard Smith

How so?

It must be remembered that what we are here considering in unprecedented usage of the most private and personal part of the human body - utterly mysterious to both sexes from the first nascent realization that little boys and girls differ. The male child experiments in autostimulation as does the female, yet here a marked divergence occurs. Sigmund Freud admittedly fallen from grace but a superb behavioural analyst nevertheless, shed new light on this crucial "phallic phase" of sexual development, occurring long before puberty. His line of reasoning runs something like this: the girl, in her attempts to autostimulation finds that as far as manipulation is concerned, her clitoris is inferior to the male's penis. This discovery has profound effects on her character development and often leads to a rejection of sexual activity. I think it safe to say that for the most part, the male escapes any such prepubescent inhibitions which are self-imposed by the female, and indeed, with the arrival of puberty so do many females (those we consider "liberated.")

However, I fear I detract from my original assertion, namely, that females and to a degree, males, through fear of the mysteries inherent in sexual ignorance and an understandable fear of the opposite sex, in effect create an obstacle (probably residing in the ego) which tends to prolong the period of virginity. Such voluntary abstinence from sexual activity becomes self-reinforcing and its cause is later easily masked by "principles."

By now, it should be fairly obvious that the first factor is closely aligned to the second that of environmental conditioning and social norms. Little need be cited here for substantiation. The effects are all too easily observed. I think, however, that the case applies more to women than men as traditionally, pre-marital sex has been deemed acceptable for males. The latter adopts the aggressive role in early stages of intersexual contact - a practice probably finding its natural roots in the inescapable fact of the male's superior brute strength, common to most mammals, and compounded by the extraneous influence of male domination observable everywhere, i.e. the male head of household, the "provider" image, the "missionary position" etc.

Yet simple recognition of the irrational existence of such primitive conventions by no means precludes women's active non-conformity to them. For example, the mere fact that the burden of criticism falls on the adolescent girl who allows herself to be seduced while the male is seen as a "normal" boy (well done, lad!) is a poor reason for maintaining virginity until marriage. Social change does not come about through an act of divine grace much these days. Only when a sufficient number of women refuse to allow social opinions to determine which road they will take in this most personal of activities will the anachronism of male "ownership" of females crumble and fall. One easily recalls how women suffragettes swallowed their pride and suffered the full battery of social criticism and scorn in their fight for representation. Granted, it took time, but the women of today owe their voting privileges (now rights) to the determination of such "unhappy heroes."

The distorted prostitution which holds marriage, or its promise as the basis for consent to intercourse degrades horribly the women of today. With the protection afforded by modern contraceptives, contemporary women have the opportunity to be pioneers in a revolution of sexual customs, and perhaps, a duty to their descendants. To let it slip by would indeed be a sad act of idleness.

Having rambled on invidiously, I would like to address myself to Mr. Smith in a more collected manner. I am in complete accordance with your contention that women perpetuate the "females as property" prejudice through the obnoxious practice of "saving themselves for Mister Right" and the proponents of such an archaic principle may be justifiably criticized. However, one should be wary not to carry the castigation of "abstainers" too far. Although non-participation in sexual activity may imply a certain amount of ignorance - through unwillingness to learn about one of life's fundamental activities, truly as natural as eating - there exists to my mind a sound principle for remaining a virgin: a simple gut feeling against intercourse. (I'm sure you recognize this and by no means intended to imply that all virgins immediately amend their condition - which by the way, is a natural condition and not an affliction). However, as soon as a virgin tries to rationalize his/her desire to remain so, then the individual is arguing from ignorance of the alternative. (Quite frankly, I have encountered no vehicle for the expression of human love quite so intense as the physical act of sex.)

Odd, isn't it, that a normative criticism should carry more weight than a rational one, in an area of such basic human concern?

Suzie-Q "endurance test"

Dear Editor:

Here we sit at 1:45 in Lower Vic awaiting the arrival of the ticket fairy at 9 a.m. after having already survived four hours of light chit-chat and half-hearted attempts at work. You may ask what we are doing here. Are the Beatles reuniting? Has Elton John finally consented to a gig at Queen's? Are we awaiting the Quebec election results? Are we cramming for Standing in Line 010? No, we are staying up all night in order to spend $10 for 3 hours of "enjoyable!" dancing in Leonard Cafeteria. "Is all this soul searching worth a few fleeting moments of pleasure?" our mothers would ask.

As per usual, a list was posted to be signed upon entry. Ha! Ha! Ha! What false hopes we entertained! It was ripped up by one of the convenors in a moment of fury and frustration. (People insisted on leaving the line for small problems like going to the washroom!) Phase No. 2 was a pseudo-concentration camp technique. We were all numbered on our right hands, a process which was to continue through the night in assorted, strange colors so as to prevent duplication. We were encouraged to familiarize ourselves with the faces of our neighbours to facilitate the long-term goal of strength in numbers. We could robbingly "deter" any aliens from pushing their way into the line in the wee small hours of the morning. While going through this night of torture our spirits were constantly boosted by the information that any form of organization (note: even our tattoos) was completely unofficial and it would be dog eat dog in the morning. We were also told to regard any self-styled leadership attempts with suspicion.

On the one hand we find ourselves in a ridiculous, demeaning and totally unwarranted situation. On the other hand plans and reservations have already been made; time and money have already been committed. A university is an institution of higher learning; Why can't the Suzy-Q committee ever learn? With available tickets of 180 and a student population of 10,000, what is the probability of getting a ticket if you aren't on the Suzy-Q committee?

Having come through one of Queen's most arduous coming-of-age rites, we have come to the conclusion that it really isn't worth it. Unfortunately, such is life—What's a girl to do for "Suzy-Q"?

Use construction boards . . .

Suggests "People meter"

Dear Editor:

While braving the elemental challenges of a particularly polar Saturday night for the chance to indulge in my favourite pursuit (intellectual discussion) at the "Subterranean" I was stricken with a rather apt use of the construction boards which presently flank this venue (University Ave.).

What I propose is that these boards be so emblazoned as to resemble an oversized ruler. This scalar measure would serve a number of purposes. Quantitative delineations would indicate the time relation of one's position in the linear sequence of fellow "waiters". (These figures are surely now available from Stats Canada.) Invaluable information concerning the number of spurious substances required to restore a condition of sanity could also be provided. Finally qualitative comments revealing the likely intellectual capacity of the "waiter" at that position could be inscribed. In closing I provide a worked example of my proposed vernacular. (2.22 hours; WHY equals 4(EX)2 plus 3 R.N. (Rusty Nails or Registered Nurses); "if you are not wearing a golden jacket, please contact Dr. E.Z. Cure of K.P.H. re: delivery of his model 222 one-piece with the custom-tailored sleeves!")

No ethics in our lineups

Dear Editor:

I am writing this letter to point out a situation at Queen's that warrants some consideration. On Saturday, November 13, a group of us headed over to line up for the pub at 7:00 p.m. (which is ridiculous but we wanted to be sure of getting in.) We got to the line up and did a quick count to find that there were 150 people in line ahead of us. I've heard that the pub holds 320, so we would go in easily and probably get tables together (there were about 20 of us). By 1:30 a recount showed that 250 people were in front of us. That meant that 100 ignorant assholes had cut in. By 8:00 when the doors opened, 300 people were going to get in before we did. By the time we got to the doors (about 8:45) the place was full except for a few chairs here and there spread around the pub.

We should never have had to line up at 7:00 in the first place. Why doesn't Queen's have more pubs? It was distressing to see these fellow students showing total disrespect for other students. We even asked some guys whom we saw cutting in to go the back of the line—they flatly refused. In fact one Commerce '77 jerk (who claims to know Karate) used the childish "come on wanna fight?" line. I guess this means that there is no point in lining up anymore because the biggest guys are going to bully their way in at 8:00 anyway.

If line patrol is needed my friends and I will gladly volunteer to bring machetes and machine guns to keep the people in line—but why do Queen's students need babysitters?

Be nice to smokers they pay your taxes

Dear Editor:

Attn: non-smoking public, and sympathizing smokers. It has come to our attention that many students at Queen's are prejudiced. No, this is not your usual type of prejudice. It is not against big mouths alcoholics or plumbers. No, it is against a very important minority: smokers. Whenever the government wants to raise taxes, the first thing they raise the price of is luxury items, i.e. cigarettes. We pay your taxes. The campus bookstore sells luxury items to help subsidize the price of your books, once again cigarettes, we lower the price of your books. We do not smoke in the dining rooms at Ban Righ, and our feeling (we are a very sensitive bunch) are hurt by you clods who suggest that we should not smoke in the dining room at Leonard. Some consideration is needed.

Crest painters infantile

Dear Editor,

I'm really not interested in perpetuating the debate over the crests and counter crests any longer, but being fingered for the latest paint job (to the Arts '79 crest in front of Douglas), a (personal) response is necessary at this point.

The original "socialist '77" crest was really a spoof; I personally regarded it as an exercise in symbol subversion, that might force people to think twice before they went on painting those things around campus. For those who never saw it, I found the crest rather nice - a hammer and sickle for workers and farmers, the feather for students, vincentinos or "we shall overcome", and a clenched fist to complete the "Q". (Please note, it also faced the opposite direction as the Stalinist figure.)

Left wing infantilism you say? Yes, but communication often has to happen on the same level its audience has chosen to act at - that is the first principle of parody. Of course, the response was right on schedule, and the "better dead than red" left on the sidewalk reflected the democratic sentiment that censored that expression.

In a letter to the Journal, Frederico Balforini demonstrated the solidarity that exists among socialists everywhere (quote, "our crest") It was gratifying to come across a leftist who exhibits more optimism than most of us can muster ("our imminent takeover"), and I've been trying to meet him ever since to find out if he really has come up with a theoretically solid breakthrough for revolutionary praxis.

To come back to the crest - it was repainted, just to show a token of resistance to tyranny. When it was censored again, I was very sorry, but because of the god awful eye sore left smeared and splattered around the concrete. To suggest that "socialists" were retaliating with the Arts '79 is pathetic. It is also unfortunate that the attempt (?) to associate one faction with that action was so unimaginative - "pinko power" would have been so much more catchy than "red power". Let's all hope this childish trashing ceases immediately.

Continued discussion required

Dear Editor:

National Student Day is over, or is it? In the past few months we have seen a massive campaign aimed at educating the public on student issues and at stimulating discussion among students concerning their problems and goals. Through pamphlets, posters, and the Journal, Lector, and Golden Words we were constantly bombarded with NSD themes and related information. But look at the themes, look at the discussion which took place on National Student Day. We talked about tuition fees, universal accessibility, the quality of education, etc. We heard "other" peoples views on the subject matter—the socialists, the Women's centre, Laurier LaPierre, Dr. Corry, the YPC's, and the list goes on and on. The discussion was good, lively, and (oh my!) entertaining. No, we did not come up with any single solution to the problems. Nor did we answer the question "Is University education worth it to the Student?" Only you, the individual student, can answer this. We did come to a consensus that the university education is of value to society. However, it would be naive to expect that in one day our problems would be solved and that my views and the views of those around me would become one and the same. Those who did participate in the day realize that the topics

Are they talking about NSD?

"To suggest that socialists were responsible is pathetic."

Russell extends the status quo

Dear Editor:

While a condemnation of Mr. Edmond David's position that Queen's "should be an apolitical university" (Journal, November 12) was very much in order, and while Mr. Paul Russell's effort in this regard (Journal, November 16) amply chastizes Mr. David on a few points regarding "logic" and "history", the effort creates problems of its own.

It is ironic that Mr. Russell's analysis extols "issues, voters, candidates" and "freedom" These are, in case one hasn't noticed, some of the most firmly-entrenched features of the "status quo" which lamhasts Mr. David for advocating. In fact, it is plain that Mr. Russell's own advocacy of a supposedly participatory "democratic society" epitomizes the perspective for which he condemns the Commerce Faculty and the Economics Department: uncritical acceptance of a particular political-economic ideology. (It is incidentally, entertaining that he grants Commerce and Economics a monopoly on the promulgation of such an uncriticised dominant ideology.)

Mr. Russell's fears of "most Queen's students" subscribing to Mr. David's viewpoint is well-justified. The irony is that if "most" students subscribe to his own viewpoint the blind fostering of the "status quo" is maintained with an efficacy which would be impossible were these lears to be realized.

Mr. David is, after all, merely another fascist or, to use Mr. Russell's terminology, an "authoritarian". In short, Mr. Russell seems to have difficulty distinguishing between the extant variety of participatory democracy, which he claims can foster "intelligent government" and "freedom", and fascism, a difficulty for which he is not entirely blameworthy.

EEC in the future;

Power to Parliament

by Hugh Dodd

Last week's article covered some of the more conventional explanations for the lack of progress in the European Economic Community's second decade of existence. Dr. C.C. Pentland of Political Science concurs with those explanations in a qualified way, but he also has some different explanations.

Some of the conventional reasons for the apparent decline in the vitality of the EEC are: Internal problems, European public mood, the growing dislike of centralization, the lack of dynamic leadership, and the intransigence of interest groups and national bureaucracies.

Dr. Pentland suggests three other, more fundamental reasons. Within the European Economic Community there is increasing economic disparity. The spread between the richest nations, Germany, Holland and Luxembourg, and the poorest nations, Britain, Italy, and Ireland, is widening. It is a hard task to harmonize economic policy over the whole Community with such a situation. As a result of economic disparity, there is an effect on currency, with strong upward pressure on the German Mark, while weaker currencies fall. Poorer countries can't compete with the richer ones in industrial output and quality. Consequently, they don't want to become involved in policy making. Policies in the EEC are thus reflected through the will of the stronger nations. Also, it could be argued that the Germans fear being drained, by having to support other members of the community. Consequently there are bad feelings on both sides, to a certain extent, and this fact undermines the process of integration.

Dr. Pentland also submits that the European Economic Community did the easy things first. Between 1958 and 1968, policy-making consisted of the evolution of the "Common Market" and a common agricultural policy. Economic, trade and tariff barriers between countries were broken down. However, after 1968, the EEC was confronted with a need to redefine priorities. A different, more profound commitment was required to realize the creation of policy that was harder to formulate.

The global environment must be assessed, in Dr. Pentland's view, in order to get a proper perspective on the question of decline in the EEC. On a more subtle level, American attitudes have strongly influenced the EEC. During the first decade, when trade barriers were being eliminated, the Americans who had a particular interest in the European economy rejoiced. These Americans just described were the multinational corporations, who simply love the absence of barriers to trade. However, as the community became more committed to planning the economy, the multi-nationals gasped in horror. The American attitude toward the EEC evolved from a positive stance to one that was at best hesitant, and at worst, negative. The multi-national corporation interest group has tried to drive wedges in the Community.

What are some of the characteristics of the present-day European Economic Community. Unemployment insurance applies on a European scale. Professions such as lawyers and doctors have the freedom to go to different countries within the Community to practise. Due to the common agricultural policy, high price levels for food have been set to help farmers. There is free movement of labour, generally from south to north, as the Italians migrate to Germany to work and support their family back home.

However, the latter situation points to one area of policymaking that is lacking in the EEC. There is a need for a common social policy. Because of the lack of jobs in Italy, the migrant goes north to find a job and or better pay. The Italian working in Germany does not feel comfortable with his German counterparts. Furthermore, when he returns back to Italy, he is often ill at ease with the hometown folks. He has seen and experienced a higher living standard and a different lifestyle than the others, and this leads to a certain amount of alienation. Dr. Pentland says that social policy for the EEC would help alleviate this and other pressing social problems.

It is clearly recognized that Germany is the strongest member of the EEC. Being leader has certain advantages and disadvantages. It costs the Germans to subsidize French agriculture and British economic survival through the framework of the Community. However, the advantages far outweigh the disadvantages. Germany gets a tremendously large free-trade area in which to sell its products. There are also the intangible benefits of being the leader. Being the top dog economically Dr. Pentland says, allows them to play the role of economics teacher for the rest of the Community. For example, leading German officials have been suggesting how other countries can keep unions in line and balance the budget. Consequently, there are political and diplomatic payoffs.

There have been two interrelated concerns for the European Economic Community's Parliament that are nearing resolution. The EEC has finally agreed upon a policy for the electoral base, and in 1978 the first election of directly elected members to the EEC Parliament will take place. The members elected to the EEC Parliament must reflect the needs of the ethnic minorities, such as the Scots and the Welsh in the United Kingdom. There will be 410 members elected to Parliament, with Britain, Germany, France, and Italy each having 81 members, and the remainder portioned to the other countries. It is each member state's decision to divide up its share of the seats into the constituencies.

Dr. Pentland sees this move as a positive influence for the European Economic Community. "Professionals will then be on the job." Presently, people are appointed by their own government, and this system has weaknesses. The political heavyweights are not on the EEC job because when one is appointed to the international agency, he is tied down to his duties there, plus his duties to the national parliament. People just can't give the time to the EEC. When politicians have the direct electoral mandate to the EEC Parliament, they will want to concentrate their energies on it.

The EEC Parliament has only limited powers now. They can scrutinize the budget, and reject or suggest alterations of expenditure. However, by 1978, more power will be demanded, because there will be a Parliament elected by the people of Europe.

Brazil - problems in a developing nation

by Kris Nowers

Brazil, for the vast majority of Canadians, probably has the same reputation that Canada has for the Brazilians; just another country. However, with the convening of the Joint Canada-Brazil Committee in Ottawa this month designed to bolster relations between the two countries, it is important to take a look at the politics and economics of this Latin American country.

Brazil is a huge nation comprising about one third of the South American continent and having a population of 107 million people. Economically, it is convenient to split the country into three general regions. The western region is the undeveloped jungle. It is sparse of population and almost no industrialization exists. The northeast region represents the thorn in Brazil's side. It is stricken with poverty and squalor among remnants of lost riches from the old days of rubber, coffee and sugar booms. Until recently, government expenditure in this region has been meagre in an area where 30 per cent of the population has only 12 per cent of the income.

The third area and by far the most important region is the south. It houses half the population and more than half the wealth. It is an area of industrial progress, foreign development and tourist paradises. Rio de Janeiro and Sao Paulo are two main cities in this area. Brazilia, the new capital of Brazil, lies to the northeast of Rio, away from the distraction of that vibrant city.

To get an adequate impression of Brazilian life one must consider the political structure and its effect on this southern region, the most important part of Brazil to Canada.

Political power in Brazil rests in the hands of the military. After a bloodless coup in 1964 that removed the elected president, the military consolidated the 13 Brazilian parties into a two party system. The official governing party was called The National Alliance for Renewal (ARENA) and the official opposition became the Brazilian Democratic Movement (MDB). The president was to be appointed by the military.

Currently, ARENA is headed by President Ernesto Geisel, a former military man, but having a quasi-democratic bent. More important though, is the increasing support being given to the MDB over the last two years, a party designed to be the opposition but never the government (at least according to the military). The upcoming municipal elections in Brazil this month should give a clear indication of which way the country is leaning. Geisel is calling the elections a confidence vote for ARENA, but he may be surprised at the outcome. However, he has certain things in his favor that make the facade of democracy quickly fade. Brazil is a prime example of how useless a political system is when the power source lies beyond the political structure.

The signs of authoritarianism are starkly evident when you consider a few specifics. The most obvious flaw lies in Brazil's Institutional Act No. 5. The act gives the president power to suspend a person's political rights, suspend habeas corpus, and if he so desires, dissolve the whole governmental system and rule by decree. It's a fairly handy tool in dealing with any opposition.

The signs of authoritarianism are starkly evident when you consider a few specifics. The most obvious flaw lies in Brazil's Institutional Act No. 5. The act gives the president power to suspend a person's political rights, suspend habeas corpus, and if he so desires, dissolve the whole governmental system and rule by decree. It's a fairly handy tool in dealing with any opposition.

More blatant abuses of power, particularly by the Brazilian security force, (SNI), were recently exposed by TIME magazine this summer involving the torture of political prisoners. The peak of the scandal occurred in October of 1975 when Vladimir Hertzog, a well known television journalist, died under SNI torture. A few personnel changes have occurred since but there has been no evidence that the torture tactics have ceased appreciably.

The existence of "death squads" in the country is another indication of how far Brazil lies from democracy in Western terms. Death squads are vigilante groups of off duty police and militia who literally go around killing suspected terrorists and criminals. The inability to control these death squads is epitomized in the story of a member of one of these squads. He has been indicted for murder 22 times but has never been brought to court; primarily due to the fact that there have been no witnesses willing to testify.

These are some of the disadvantages of military control in Brazil. But this tight control, although lacking the virtues of Western democracies, has given Brazil an economic jump ahead of its neighbouring Latin American countries. First, it has given Brazil political stability for over a decade, allowing the military to become accustomed to and efficient at the day to day duties of running a country. Second, the major priority of the military is to make Brazil a world power and therefore it has instituted a policy of vigorous development and industrialization.

Economically, the statistics for Brazil are fairly good. Throughout the latter part of the sixties real growth was almost 10 per cent per year. However, it is probably pretty uncomfortable living in a country with an inflation rate getting close to 50 per cent. Indeed, Brazil is in the unique position of having to deal with both the problems of a developed country and those of an underdeveloped one. Trying to stop rampant inflation, introduce pollution controls, clean up the massive poverty, increase employment and tap its vast resources all at the same time is, needless to say, a fairly complex task.

Canada's role in Brazil has, for the most part, been private investment by major Canadian industrial firms. Canadian exports to Brazil totalled $194 million dollars in goods and services. However, about a quarter of that figure was wheat and with the internal supplies growing within Brazil each year this large export portion will quickly diminish. This is a major reason for the upcoming meeting. It will be interesting to see what agreements, if any, will result this month.

On the provincial level, Ontario seems to be the most actively involved province with Brazil. Other provinces have sent trade missions but only Ontario maintains a permanent representative in Sao Paulo. The University of Western Ontario is also designing case studies of economic and managerial problems for its business school students.

Up to the present, it has been primarily economics that has drawn Canada in contact with Brazil. However, if sizeable economic ties can be developed, a cultural exchange between the two countries will also be possible. No doubt differing political views between Canada and Brazil may still relations a bit but the blend of European sophistication and South American primitiveness that is characteristic of Brazil (nearly all Brazilians are of European descent) will attract many Canadians into exploring this diverse and dynamic country.

Queen's chamber singers and orchestra offer an evening of Purcell

"Come Ye Sons of Art" to an evening of the music of Henry Purcell, provided by Queen's Chamber Singers (under the direction of Margaret McLellan) together with Queen's Chamber Orchestra (director Clifford Crawley), in City Hall, on Saturday, 20 November 1976, at 8:30 of the clock.

The program consists of works, composed for important occasions at the Court as well as in the city, by Henry Purcell, who served in a variety of positions at the English Court during the reigns of Charles II, James II and William and Mary. The first work "Funeral Music for Queen Mary" was prepared by the composer for the elaborate ceremonies connected with the funeral of that Queen on 5 March 1695. It depicts with severity of style in the instrumental pieces and depth of expression in the anthems, the procession to Westminster Abbey and the burial service there. In the two Odes which follow, the wind instruments play as important a part as the singers, usually in the form of a duet between instrument and voice, such as the lovely soprano solo with oboe, "Bid the Virtues, bid the Graces" from the "Ode for the Birthday of Queen Mary", sung by Helen McAlear with Janet Page, oboe. Another example of this interplay of voice and instruments is the memorable "The life and harmony of war" from the "Ode to St. Cecilia's Day", sung by counter-tenor David Barber, accompanied solely by two trumpets (Bruce Cowell and Tony Ciccone) and kettle drums (Trevor Houle).

In accordance with the practice of that time, the orchestra consists of trumpets, trombones, oboes, flutes and timpani together with stringed instruments and harpsichord continuo.

Queen's Chamber Singers, founded in 1972 by Rudolph Schnitzler, and conducted this year by Margaret McLellan, is composed of twenty-six voices selected, after audition, for their vocal abilities. Margaret McLellan is familiar to Kingston audiences in several areas of music making. An accomplished pianist, she is Assistant Professor of Music at Queen's, assistant conductor and accompanist for the Kingston Choral Society; for fifteen years was director-singer of the Cecilian Consort, and last year directed the Queen's Collegium Musicum.

The twenty-eight instrumentalists who form the Queen's Chamber Orchestra are directed for the second successive year by Clifford Crawley. Mr. Crawley, who also conducts the Kingston Symphony Youth Orchestra, is Associate Professor of Music.

Admission to the concert on November 10, as to all the events sponsored by the Music Department, is free.

Eleanor Aylsworth and David Prosser in "The Cherry Orchard", running this Thursday, Friday, and Saturday evenings in Convocation Hall.

Vaghy String Quartet A fine and sensitive performance

by James Hipkin

Deszo and Tibor Vaghy playing violin and viola respectively, along with David George, violin and Robert Dodson, cello, comprise the Vaghy string quartet. This group have been artists in residence at Queen's University for the past seven years. In this time they have shown themselves to be an ensemble of the highest calibre playing to critical acclaim in the United States and Canada.

Last Wednesday night saw the last performance of the term by the quartet. The programme was Mozart's String Quartet in C major K. 465, Paul Crawford's L'Etiole Nuit and Beethoven's String Quartet in E flat opus 74. The Mozart is the oldest work dating from January, 1785 and first performed in February of the same year. The performance took place at an informal gathering at Mozart's home; the musicians included Haydn playing violin and Mozart playing viola K. 465 and the other quartets played during the evening moved Haydn to say of the younger Mozart "I tell you before God as an honest man that (Mozart) is the greatest composer known to me."

This composition has been nicknamed the "Dissonant" and includes more revisions than was typical of Mozart. The opening dissonance was the cause for the nickname and created much bafflement and discussion when the quartet was first heard.

The Vaghy's played the opening with forceful confidence and a full sound. However this force and rich texture was carried into the succeeding allegro. This was played in a robust heady manner which is foreign to the transparent style required in this music. The tempo was very fast and the playing was clean and smooth. There did seem to be some loss of line as a result of this but the quartet's full tonal quality. This movement is a very fine piece of writing. The beautiful harmonies are highlighted by clashes of dissonance, the results of which were quite breathtaking.

The final movements, minuetto and allegro molto, were exciting and rhythmically very tight. There was some fine solo playing by Deszo Vaghy and some of the best second violin playing we are likely to hear. David George did a masterful job playing the rather uninteresting second parts with colour and enthusiasm, without being obtrusive.

Paul Crawford was born in Toronto in 1947. His L'Etiole Nuit is very "interesting." The work had many moments of vibrant excitement and rich colour; however, the quartet idiom didn't seem to be used as fully as it could have been. The cello always seemed to be playing in the lower registers and the first violin in its upper registers. In fact, generally the expected happened far too often. This could be seen clearly in the audience which seemed to turn off two thirds of the way through. Repetition was featured prominently and initially helped to clarify what was happening. Toward the end, it started to wear a bit thin as some aspects such as tremolo were used and reused. On the whole L'Etiole Nuit was very commercial contemporary music, enjoyable but lacking in depth.

The playing was excellent. Concentration and communication was evident throughout. There was some especially notable harmonic playing in the middle section and the ensemble was superb. It is good to see and hear contemporary music included in the repertoire of prominent chamber ensembles.

The climax of the evening in all respects was the Beethoven. This quartet was written in 1809 and shows Beethoven in a transition to his third style. As with the Mozart, a nickname has been applied. This quartet has been named the "Harp" because of prominent pizzicato passages in the first movement.

The first movement is almost a thematic. The main interest lies in the harmonies and the melodies spin out as a consequence of this. The quartet's playing was close-knit in this movement. Each line appeared clearly and with a solid harmonic background. The romantic feeling is strongly evident in the second movement which features gentle modulation but never reaches the level of sentimentality. The Presto was done very quickly but always under control. Some clarity was lost on some of the lines. The final section, marked andante con variazione, featured each instrument in at least one of six variations. The viola solo in the second variation had a full, round sound. The playing was apparent without being dominating. Deszo Vaghy produced a driving sound which dominated and bled to fine effect in the fifth variation.

It was an enjoyable, rewarding night, the music was good and the performance for the most part was excellent. We are indeed lucky to have this fine string quartet at Queen's.

It's unfortunate that Dunning Hall was not full on Wednesday night. This music is approachable and enjoyable. It is a great pity that more students don't take advantage of these opportunities.

Ringo's Rotogravure makes for a good time

by Bob Murphy

When the Beatles finally split in 1970 after ten years of unprecedented success, it was presumed by most that John, Paul and George would go on to solo success. Ringo, the least talented of the four, would have little choice but to fall into a semi-retirement, perhaps occasionally helping out on sessions to keep in shape and spending the rest of his time pursuing his interest in films.

While Ringo refused to leave recording altogether, his first two solo releases were self-indulgent pieces, aimed more at satisfying his personal whims than at gaining himself an audience. Both "Sentimental Journey," a George Martin produced trip down memory lane and "Beaucoups of Blues," Ringo's shot at being a country singer, though not completely without charm are best left to diehard fans only.

Finally in 1973, with his marriage on the rocks, and few others coming in from movieland, Ringo decided to make one last bid for recording star status. On a tip from long-time Beatle playmate, Harry Nilsson, he looked up producer Richard Perry (who was coming hot off of successes with both Nilsson and Carly Simon) and the magical connection was made.

What resulted were two highly successful albums ("Ringo" and "Goodnight Vienna") filled with a delightful brand of good, untimely pop. Lending a hand to the proceedings was a star-studded cast which included, among many others, John Lennon, George Harrison and Paul McCartney.

Although Ringo switches producers this time out, forsaking Perry for ace soul producer Anif Mardin, the format on Rotogravure his latest offering is a little changed from that of his two previous hits. It is a formula that still wears well.

In a business as competitive as the recording industry, it is especially refreshing to see the number of names who willingly offer their services in return for only the good time to be had. As Ringo acknowledges in the liner notes, "Thanks to all those who gave everything and took nothing. Goodbye to all those who took everything and gave nothing."

Ringo's albums are something to look forward to, not because he is a great singer (at best his vocals are adequate) nor because the music is great (although it often is), but rather because they are so much fun. What Ringo may lack in talent, he makes up for with loads of personality and as long as the joyously infectious atmosphere that seems to surround the making of his records continues to be caught on vinyl, we should all continue to listen.

All the best tracks manage to exude the high, fun-loving spirit in which they were recorded. "A Dose of Rock 'N Roll" kicks things off with just that right feel (shoo-wah, shoo-wah-wah) to get you in the mood.

"Hey Baby" follows up with a great singalong chorus to keep you there. John Lennon of all the Beatles, continues to supply Ringo with the catchiest material. Here "Cookin' (In the Kitchen of Love)" rocks jauntily.

McCartney's "Pure Gold," though more than a touch saccharine, is well suited to Ringo's style and range. Ringo's own "Cryin'" (sounding like something right off of 'Beaucoups of Blues') provides an interesting change of pace.

While Ringo will never be a great singer, it is just this limitation that accounts for a large part of his and Rotogravure's appeal. The listener is constantly invited (at times it seems obligated) to join in and lend a hand, or voice.

So, if you are getting together with a few friends and you really want to have a good time do not get up and dance to K.C. and the Sunshine Band; get up and sing along with Ringo Starr and Company.

Hockey Gaels show true colours

by Tom Shand

Well, the "real" Golden Gael Hockey team emerged from hibernation on Tuesday night at Ottawa's Sandy Hill Arena and I have to tell you it was a pleasant sight to see.

The Gaels scored four unanswered goals in the third period to defeat the Ottawa U Gee Gees 5-3. This victory was the first of the regular season for the injury-plagued Queen's squad. The significance of the win extends far beyond two points in the standings as it allowed the Gaels to show themselves how well they can play. It should set the scene for a very exciting weekend of hockey here when the U. of T. Blues bring their show to town.

The Gaels' injury count continued to mount as forward Gavin Laws was carried off the ice on a stretcher with suspected torn knee ligaments. It is uncertain at this time how long he will be out of action. Fortunately for the Gaels, the "Wing" (Willie) will be back in action this weekend which should help bolster the ranks.

Ned MacIntyre made his return to the lineup felt as he scored the tying goal and assisted on two others. Ned is still playing with injuries as are many Gael players, including Glenn Furgoch whose thumb is broken and Joe Pecarik whose finger is fractured.

The Gaels appeared to have the edge in play in all three periods. They did however, fall prey to a five minute Gee Gee scoring spree at the end of the second period when Ottawa scored three goals to erase Queen's 1-0 lead. The Gaels knew they deserved a better fate and refused to allow their five minutes of misfortune to demoralize them. Consequently they earned the win they rightly deserved in the third period as things finally broke right for them.

The most important goal of the game was scored by Frank Coffee early in the third period as he started the Gaels on their comeback trail and narrowed Ottawa's lead to 3-2.

Ned then tied the score as he banged in a rebound of a Kevin Treacy shot. Jay Babcock earned assists on both these goals and also scored the game's first goal in the second period. Jay has been moved back to defence and looked very sharp and was always in control.

Young Gary Brandt continued with a spectacular solo rush down the left side and put the winning fourth goal away on the backhand. Although the rookie Brandt has anything but an awe-inspiring look about him, his play along with the determined efforts of fellow rookie John (Jed) MacIntyre seem to have done much to ignite the veterans.

Terry Angel closed the scoring with a well aimed slapshot in the final minute of play to cap-off by far his finest game of the regular season. Besides picking up three points, (Angie) skated and checked with the vigour we can come to expect from him.

The game was fast, tough and clean as both teams played to win

Ned MacIntyre raises stick in jubilation after scoring tying goal. Shand

The Gee Gees are a much improved team from last year and could provide problems for some of the leagues' more talented teams if given a chance.

Defenceman Steve Brown led Ottawa scorers with a pair of goals and Brian McCullough fired the Gee Gees' third goal. On Brown's second, Gaels' goalie Andy Schell was pushed back in the net and Trainer Al Allmark still claims the puck never went in but rather off Schell's skate and out.

Schell played well for Queen's and stopped 30 shots. Gino Yanire, for the Gee Gees, was very tough for 'lucky' say the Gaels) for the first two periods but wilted under pressure in the third. His "hot dog" style persisted of making routine saves look spectacular.

Women's B-ball nets first win

The Queen's Golden Gals racked up their first win of the season this weekend defeating the Guelph Gryphons 54-44.

The Gals were much more confident going into this game. They had worked hard all week going over their offense and the game on Saturday proved that they had finally "got it together." The Gals played as a team instead of as five individuals and kept control of most of the game. Help on defense was exceptional and team fouls were kept to three for the entire game. Janice Deakin, a rookie this year, was the top rebounder and top scorer with Donna Roman. Sue Gillies, and Kim Headford scored 15, 10 and 10 points respectively. Hitting 46 per cent from the floor was the icing on the cake.

The Gals are out to improve their one win-one loss record this weekend when they play York Friday at 6:00 p.m. and Windsor on Saturday at 2:00 p.m.

Queen's takes close 3rd in Inv. Swim Meet

Queen's held its annual Co-ed Invitational Swim Meet on Saturday. It was the first meet of the year for the Queen's women's and men's teams and in the final combined results, we emerged in third place; one point behind the Peterborough "Y" Swim Club and twenty points behind the winners, John Abbott College. Pat Lajoie of Cornwall set Ontario records in the 50 and 100-yard freestyles for 13 and 14-year-olds boys.

Diana Harrison led things off for the women's team by winning the 50-yard freestyle. She returned later to place fourth in the 100-yard freestyle and to lead the freestyle relay team to a strong second place showing.

Another strong performance was put in by Francine Vickery who placed third in the 200-yard Freestyle and sixth in the 200 Back, which was the very next race. Jennifer Hietala placed sixth in the 200 Individual Medley right behind teammate Diane U., while in the 100-Butterfly, Jennifer came fourth and Diane sixth. Other commendable performances were put in by Ariadne Symons, Bev Webb, Cathy Leck, Lucie Hewitt, Susan Sculthorpe, Paula Rodgers, Heather MacWilliam and team veteran Jane Noakes.

The men's team was once again led by the strong swimming of team captain, Tim Dennis. He won the 200 Backstroke, came second in the 100 Backstroke, tied his own school record in winning the 200 I.M. and combined with Ken D. vies, Roger Cassidy and Lang Brithford for an impressive victory in the final freestyle relay. Davies also placed a disappointing second in the 50-yard Free and helped the Medley Relay team to a third place finish while Brithford had a good day coming a close third to Davies in the 50 and setting personal-best times in all his events. Cassidy also came sixth in the 200 Freestyle and was anchor on the third place Medley Relay team. Other strong performances were put in by team co-captain, Brian Doziel (third in 200 Free, 100 Fly and Medley Relay), Jim Wiley (second in 100 Breast Stroke, third in Medley Relay) and Alex Muir (second in 100 Free). Swimming Exhibition from Queen's were Scott Scheurmann and Greg Vanular both of whom turned some line times.

Other respectable performances came from Joe Schnitker, Wayne Serebrin, John Haydon, Dave Willis and team inspirational leader Marty (All Right!) Demmers.

Overall, the team's performance was very commendable and the prospects look good as the women head for McMaster and the men to Willred Laurier for meets this coming weekend. A special word of thanks goes to Sheila McKurdy and Pam Skene for their help in organizing this meet.

CAC's Corner Backgammon: The sport of 'Queen's'

by Chris Chenoweth

Five years ago the game craze at Canadian universities was bridge. Today a new craze has hit Queen's campus, as scores of boys and girls are getting lucky over late night games of the hottest social sport - backgammon.

Backgammon is defined in the Oxford Concise Dictionary as "a game played on a special double board with draughts (checkers-style pieces) and dice; called backgammon because the pieces go back or re-enter the game board". Believed to have originated in China thousands of years ago, backgammon is indeed accurately described as one of the most fun, interesting and yet skillfully competitive games since the invention of cribbage.

The game is played on a board which is divided into halves, and each side contains further divisions of 6 slices on either half of this section. In other words, each half of the board is a replica of the other side, and one half contains a total of 12 sliced divisions with six slices per side. Fifteen discs or pieces are provided per player, and one set is coloured red for one team and white for the opponent. The 15 pieces are set up in an order of five discs which are stacked on slice No. 6, with 2 pieces resting on slice No. 8; on the opposite side the player's pieces are placed 3 in a stack on slice No. 17, and finally five red discs on slice No. 20. The white piece opponent would then place his/her same number of discs on the comparable slices exactly opposite to the red player's own pieces. Each player is handed two dice, and the game is ready to begin.

The object of backgammon is simple - total annihilation of your opponent. This is accomplished by dicing and then moving your pieces in a clockwise fashion (anti-clockwise for opponent) the number of spaces rolled per dice, and in a direction towards the far end of the board. Once all your pieces are in the final section of six slices, you may commence to dice your pieces off the board. First player to remove all his/her discs off the backgammon board wins.

The beauty and difficulty of backgammon is when a player rolls a number which allows his moving piece to bump off the opponent's disc. This is accomplished when a player dices a number which allows him to rest on the slice which contains an opponent's disc. The opponent must give up his slice to the player, and he moves his defeated piece off the board until his next turn. During the opponent's turn hopefully the dice rolled will then allow the opponent to return his/her own piece back onto one of the first six slices, and hence re-enter the game. The complication is that no piece may move into an opponent's slice which has two or more discs stacked on it. Obviously once one player has the final six slices stacked with his men, while the opponent has a piece pushed off of the board, then the opponent must wait until any one of those six slices contains one or no discs before the opponent can re-enter his piece into the game. If he does re-enter, at this point the only hope for victory would be to bump one of the opponent's discs from those final six slices - hence the term "playing a back game."

The rules sound complicated, but this is probably due to my inadequacies as a journalist. Really backgammon basics are simple to learn, but it takes much greater practice to develop good backgammon techniques.

Backgammon is a game of skill and intellect, but probably the real thrill of the match is that backgammon is a great social sport. It is not just a "two man game" for backgammon can be played by either sex or as a mixed pair. Indeed, men and women all over campus are meeting in the pub on a Friday afternoon or in their homes for a good, hard game of backgammon. Usually backgammon leads to conversation, and when that starts...

Queen's Grapplers see action

by Alex Faseruk

On Saturday, November 20, the Golden Grapplers will be travelling to RMC for their first wrestling encounter of the season. After just six weeks of practice, Coach Roy Worthington has assembled quite an impressive looking team in his first season as the wrestling coach at Queen's.

The team is composed of some fairly talented rookies with just a few veterans. Returning from last year are Ron (Crash) Craddock, Larry Pearson and Del DeMonte. Ron Craddock, in his first wrestling season battled to a fourth place finish in the OUAA Championships. Larry Pearson managed to pick up a fifth place in the Championships. Del DeMonte is back for his sixth wrestling season at Queen's. Del, the "Old Man" of Queen's wrestling, has always done well while competing for Queen's.

This year, Del has used up his five years of eligibility and will be unable to compete in the championships. He will be able to compete in all of the tournaments prior to the OUAA Championships to be held on February 19 and 20 at Waterloo.

Traditionally, Queen's does not fare well in wrestling. In past seasons, Queen's has generally been without depth in its team, having few good natural wrestlers. This year, the Queen's team has many outstanding rookie wrestlers in the middle weight categories (from 126 to 158 pounds). The team is, however, lacking wrestlers in the lightweight categories (107 to 118 pounds) and at the heavier weight categories (167, 177, 190, 220 pounds) and heavyweight in which there are few, if any competitors. Any interested wrestlers should attend a Queen's practice held every weekday from 5:30 to 7:00 in the Combatives Room of the Phys. Ed Centre.

The RMC tournament, which has only been held twice before, should provide Coach Worthington with a fair assessment of his young squad. The first RMC tournament was a fairly weak one in which Queen's managed to win the team championship by edging out York by a 41-40 margin. In that tournament, Queen's picked up two first places by Doug Sands and Ed David, both of whom have chosen not to compete this year. In addition, Queen's picked up many second and third places.

Last year's RMC tournament was tougher than one would have anticipated. Queen's managed only one first place by Mike Dwythie and two third places by Larry DuChene and Alex Faseruk.

This year, the tournament is closed to national champion wrestlers who have not had any international experience as such. Queen's should be able to improve upon last year's performance. The tournament will be held at RMC's new Physical Education Complex beginning at 11:00 on Saturday, November 20. The Gaels would definitely appreciate fan support on Saturday.

An Argo syndrome?

by Dave Tod

Well volleyball fans, what can I say? The Gaels suffered a disappointing tournament at RMC this weekend. It was their first OUAA league tournament and hopes were high for a clean sweep of victories against Ryerson, U. of T. and Laurentian. This, unfortunately, did not occur. In the first match, the Gaels breezed past Ryerson 15-4, 15-8, 15-11 but in the afternoon experienced frustrating losses at the hands of Toronto 15-11, 12-15, 13-15, 8-15 and Laurentian 11-15, 12-15, 15-11 and 12-15.

Volleyball is a game of careful strategy and concentrated power. It is also a sport where a team's attitude can decide its victory or defeat. After the loss to the Varsity Blues, the Gaels suffered a mental let-down from which they never recovered.

The Gaels seem to be experiencing the Toronto Argonaut syndrome; on paper they're great but they can't seem to put two good matches together. An OUAA official remarked that Queen's has excellent talent yet they remain inconsistent and lack cohesion in their play. Queen's Gaels will have to undergo some critical introspection if they want to regain the form they demonstrated at Brock three weeks ago.

To date, Coach Donna Gallagher is pleased with the Gaels' volleyball performance. They have played in two tournaments this year: one on October 16, at Queen's where they finished as one of the top university teams in attendance (scores were not available) and at RMC, November 6, where they won five of eight games and gave two strong club teams a run for their money.

The team for the most part is young and inexperienced except for Barb Morrison and Cathy Sproul who both have three years experience. Returning to the intercollegiate volleyball scene this year are Jill Calder and Sue Higgins. Promising rookies include: Jane Reble, Laura Youz, Jane Skirda, Janise Heard, Nicole Randall, Jan Lavender, Diane Browne, Debbie Lidstone and Marilyn Robson.

The objective of the teams now that the regular season has begun, is to remain in the elite division of the OWIAA, (i.e., the division that consists of the top six of twenty-one Ontario university and college teams). Last year the Gaels placed fifth in the elite category. The team is enthusiastic and determined, so Queen's can expect a real effort from our women. The Gaels' next tournament is this weekend (November 20) at York. If you have a chance to get down to Toronto this Saturday, watch the girls in action.

BEWS NEWS

Last Thursday night PHE wrapped up the Flag Football championship, winning consecutive games over a Commerce 79 team which appeared to have peaked too early. The first game was all PHE. Bruce McFarlane methodically picked the 79 secondary to pieces throwing quick passes in the flat finally connecting on a 45-yard pass-and-run play to "Powie". After this early touchdown, the game settled into monotony being broken only by McFarlane's bootleg of 60 yards for a touchdown with less than two minutes left in the game. Final score: PHE 14-Comm 79. 6

The second game opened with Stacey Merrit returning the opening kick-off 79 yards for a touchdown. The convert was blocked and this seemed to inspire Commerce as they took the ensuing kick-off and marked 65 yards for the touchdown, Don Cameron running the last two over the block of Jim Screation. Fred Burton kicked the convert and it appeared PHE was in trouble.

went 50 yards on the center sneak down to the 79 twenty-five yard line. The next three plays netted two yards and McFarlane booted a 32 yard field goal which sewed up the game and the championship 9-7.

Congratulations should be given to convener Don Fairbairn who did an excellent job despite a distinct lack of referees and adverse weather conditions. Don was rumoured to have been celebrating the end of the season Friday night in a somewhat inebriated state. In an interview with this reporter he denied this vehemently but did admit to being a mess Saturday morning when he reportedly walked into two trees.

SPORT SHORTS. As hockey nears the end of the first term action Arts 77, MBA, Commerce 79 and Meds remain the only undefeated teams. Softball play-offs begin next week, the teams to watch are PHE, Arts 77, Commerce 77 and Commerce 79. PHE are Volleyball champions.

Stocks fell

The Canadian dollar fell sharply in early trading on the stock market Tuesday in reaction to the Parti Quebecois majority in the Quebec provincial election. Later in the day it recovered and went on to close only slightly lower than its closing price on Monday (down to $1.022 from $1.0231).

Many stocks associated with the province of Quebec also fell quite badly. Although the volume of stocks processed was moderate the Toronto Stock Exchange had the largest drop in its index of trade in two years. The decline of stocks continued for the whole day with no recovery, but many investment professionals feel the drop is only temporary.

Beirut near normal

After 19 months of civil war, the streets of Beirut, Lebanon, were relatively peaceful, although under the guns of the Syrian Army peacekeepers. People flooded into the streets and business activity began flourishing only one day after Syrian troops moved into the city. President Elias Sarkis plans to rebuild Lebanon's dispersed regular forces as a first step to consolidate the truce. Reports say the President has set November 22 as the target date for reopening the Beirut airport, restoring full electricity service in the city and ensuring normal supplies of gasoline.

Joey tries again

Joey Smallwood, 76, who gave up power in 1972 after spending nearly 23 years as Premier of Newfoundland, is reported to be trying for the leadership of the Liberal party again. This will be his second attempt in two years.

The next Liberal convention is next Oct. 14-15 and party leader Ed Roberts must put his job on the line. He narrowly won over Mr. Smallwood in 1974.

Mr. Smallwood was previously head of a splinter group that rejoined the Liberals when he got "a commitment" from Mr. Roberts to "a statement of principals that will once again make the Liberals a great, crusading party." He also got a commitment for a policy convention next spring.

Bethany house

A very special house exists in Odessa, a thirteen-room, one hundred and twenty-year-old stone home where Don and Jackie DiRocco live with their five children and various guests. Bethany House is what is usually called a "half-way" house, and over the past ten months a good two hundred "guests" have stayed with the DiRoccos.

Especially welcome are relatives visiting inmates of this area's penal institutes, inmates on temporary absence passes, and inmates on parole who sometimes need extra time before being able to re-establish themselves and their families in the community. Infants of women in the Prison for Women are also looked after, and this often prevents them being taken in charge by social agencies who do not necessarily guarantee their return to their mothers once the latter are released.

Bethany House runs as a Christian-centered home and tries to help guests find a more meaningful life. The house has been operating for five years, but now faces financial problems. The DiRoccos work in close co-operation with area prison administrators, but the government does not fund them, and Don DiRocco meets most of the costs from his own salary as vice-principal of Amherstview's Our Lady of Mount Carmel Separate School. An appeal is being made for any donations, and also for people interested in helping on a volunteer basis in the house.

Office space

The federal government rents almost 60,000 square feet of office space in Kingston. This represents an increase of approximately twenty per cent in the amount of space leased by the Crown in the past five years. As well as the many offices leased in various buildings, the federal government owns the Government of Canada Building located at Clarence and Wellington streets, the old Post Office on Clarence Street, the Customs House at King and Clarence, and all the armed forces and penitentiary buildings.

Want halt on project

Canada has expressed concern about the Gamson Diversion project in North Dakota and would like a moratorium on construction on the dam. If work on the dam is not stopped it may be difficult to stop water from the Missouri River system from polluting the Red-River-Lake Winnipeg Basin.

External Affairs Ministers Donald Jamieson has been in contact with the U.S. State Department and The International Joint Commission on the matter. The IJC is investigating the Canadian claim of possible pollution and will be giving a full report by June. Mr. Jamieson is asking for a halt on construction until that report is out. He feels that once the dam is completed there will be a temptation to use it no matter what the IRC decides.

Brezhnev and Tito talk

Soviet Communist Party chief Leonid Brezhnev is presently conducting talks with Yugoslav President Tito in Belgrade. The two heads of state, as well as senior ministers and aides, are discussing relations between their countries.

President Tito wants to be sure that there will be no compromise on his country's independence for the sake of good relations with Moscow, and Brezhnev seemed intent on reassuring him that the Soviets non-intervention pledge made towards Yugoslavia more than 20 years ago would remain in force.

Church admits black

Members of Carter's Baptist Church voted to end racial barriers to church membership. Eleven years ago, the Carters were virtually the only members of the church to vote for admission of blacks.

The controversy began a month ago when Rev. Clennon King announced he would seek membership in the church. His attempt led the deacons to cancel services on Sunday and lock the doors the next Sunday.

Also at issue was whether Mr. Edwards could continue as pastor after his criticism of the deacons' decision to uphold the 1965 policy barring "blacks and other civil rights activists".

Protest march

About 4,000 Italians protested earlier this week against the release from prison of Hubert Kappler, the German Nazi officer who ordered the massacre of 335 people near Rome during the second World War. The marchers, many of whom were relatives and descendants of the dead, marched to the caves on the southern edge of Rome where the victims were buried.

Mr. Kappler, 69, was released on Saturday after 28 years of imprisonment. He asked to be allowed to go home to Germany to die, and West German President Walter Scheel appealed to Italy for his freedom.

Mr. Kappler is presently in a hospital in Rome, in critical condition with stomach cancer, and should be returning to his home in Germany shortly.

One of the most coveted offices on Parliament Hill is up for grabs now that James Richardson has resigned as Defence Minister. Room 312 in the West Block was built specially for Alexander Mackenzie when he was Prime Minister, and features a secret staircase when Mr. Mackenzie used to leave the building without being seen by the lines of unemployed seeking jobs in the federal government and hoping for an interview with the Prime Minister. Pierre Trudeau had the office as Justice Minister and found the exit useful to avoid reporters after his election as Prime Minister.

Will Quebec secede?

This was the question Principal R.L. Watts and other political studies professors asked themselves during a symposium held Saturday in Dunning Hall. From left: Principal Watts, Prof. C.C. Pentland and Prof. P.M. Leslie.

Saturday symposium: Watts expects violence if Quebecois separate

by Rob Reynolds

A Saturday afternoon symposium on the Parti Quebecois and its relations with Canada, brought together leading federalists from the Queen's Political Studies Department who held little hope for Canada existing in its present form.

Although the professors, Watts, Thorburn, Pentland, Leslie, Black and Simeon addressed themselves to various questions in dealing with Quebec, the separation of that province from what is now Canada was implicit throughout the symposium.

Citing experiences in other federations, Principal Watts concluded that it is, "rare for peaceful secession to occur." Continuing, Dr. Watts referred to the Quebec election as "a real watershed in Canadian history", and expressed doubts that the objective of Rene Levesque and the P.Q. to separate could be achieved "through peaceful means."

According to Dr. Watts "once one alienated group becomes interested in seceding, they don't worry about constitutional niceties." The Queen's Principal pointed to the Partition struggle in India as an example of a supposedly peaceful secession movement which turned violent. Prof. Richard Simeon then considered the economic factors of separation, which were to permeate the afternoon discussion. Prof. Simeon referred to the P.Q. as "a government absolutely committed to separation." Prof. Simeon did not see the pull-out of current investment in Quebec as the greatest economic threat to that province, but rather, conjectured "what will happen to new investment?"

Prof. Simeon also constructed different scenarios to illustrate the federal government's future relations with Quebec. One of these was the

"punish Quebec" thesis, whereby the federal government would refuse to grant considerations to Quebec as long as that province adopts a separatist position. The second scenario, constructed by Prof. Simeon, consisted of convincing Quebec "that federalism works." The third, and most favourable to Simeon was one whereby Quebec "achieves a really special status."

Professor of International Politics, Charles Pentland, dealt with the economic ties that Quebec could establish were it to separate. Prof. Pentland questioned the assumption that the "new association will be between Quebec and the rest of Canada." In terms of an alternative for Quebec, he did point out that the province, "might seek some association with the European Common Market."

One argument that Prof. Pentland put forward was that of a customs union between Quebec and the remainder of Canada. Prof. Pentland quoted Rene Levesque as saying in Foreign Affairs that a customs union could exist, "as long as both countries find it mutually advantageous."

Prof. Hugh Thorburn provided insight in the federal-provincial context when he remarked upon the probable unwillingness of the western provinces to cater to Quebec. In discussing the "Two Nation" concept, Prof. Thorburn remarked that it was, "easy to identify one nation - Quebec, but hard to identify the second nation."

In contesting the economic tenor of the discussion Prof. Black noted that, "I disagree that good economic common sense will decide the issue." As Prof. William Irvine asked from the audience, "What are we really bargaining for, economics or something deeper?"

Entrance exams urged

University entrance examinations should be established on a province-wide basis as a common standard of testing university applicants, recommended the arts and science faculty board last Friday.

Dr. A.W. MacLean of the department of psychology and committee chairman, said the recommended entrance exams would cover most areas of study, and particularly mathematics and English.

Dr. MacLean said the exams would be a supplementary measure to present university admission procedures. They would be the responsibility of the universities, free of charge and flexible. Dr. MacLean indicated they would change with the education standards in Ontario.

The recommendations have been forwarded to Principal Watts, who will pass them on, in combination with other faculty recommendations to the provincial government.

Project scream

The AMS is in a bind

The AMS executive is understandably dismayed by the results of its referendum and opinion poll held last week. Students displayed little sympathy for AMS and OFS official policy - if indeed they were aware of it - and voted overwhelmingly in favour of differential fees for foreign students and against the principle of free tuition.

Outer Council and the executive is now obliged to reverse its position on the issue of differential fees for foreign students, the referendum question, but ludicrously enough, it can ignore its constituents on the opinion poll issue of free tuition. Yet the distinction between opinion poll and referendum is not profound and reflected a fearful AMS which predicted that students would oppose free tuition but support its opposition to differential fees.

Outer Council badly miscalculated and now finds itself caught between its heretofore avowed policy of supporting the OFS opposition to differential fees and the recent binding student rejection of that position.

Hugh Christie, AMS External Affairs Commissioner, charged last Tuesday in the Journal that the provincial government's decision to levy differential fees against students from other countries was based upon a lack of information and that it represents "a basic injustice". He concurred with the Principal of Queen's who has stated in the Senate that the government's policy "smacks of racism." On the other hand, we have suggested that it is the responsibility of the federal government, rather than that of the province of Ontario, to maintain foreign aid programmes notably, in this context, providing education to those from the third world. Moreover it is scarcely the duty of the Ontario taxpayer to induce students from rich, developed countries to come here merely to benefit from cheap tuition. Yet regardless of the rights and wrongs in this issue, the fact remains that the AMS, having unwisely chosen to run their government by referendum will have to face the consequences.

The students' viewpoint has been solicited and this must dictate future AMS policy on this subject regardless of past commitment to the OFS.

We have previously questioned the wisdom of the AMS in submitting such issues as differential fees to student referendum - let alone the futility of holding opinion polls. Complex issues involving public policy call for careful consideration of numerous factors. Open deliberation by democratically elected student representatives in Outer Council exposes for all to see and hear the rationale behind the construction of a given policy. Such a process does much to lend substance and credibility to a particular position.

Conversely, the collective response, however well informed and reasoned of 22 per cent of the student body to a simplistic question is hopelessly unconstructive. The individual student, in formulating his or her decision, does so in the darkness of his/her own mind. This is the tyranny of the mass, because no one can ever be sure of what factors led to the collective response. Hugh Christie may inform his colleagues on the executive of the OFS that Queen's has reversed its stand on the issue of differential fees, but he will be hard put to tell them upon what basis such a decision was made. Moreover, he will find it exceedingly difficult persuading them to come around to our position. As a result, little more may be said than that Queen's is a conservative campus, description of mood rather than an analysis of our position.

The tyranny of the mass

What can the AMS do? We have learned that our representatives will likely choose to ignore the campus position until such time as the students have had the opportunity to correct their point of view. Perhaps the 78 per cent of the campus who chose not to vote last week can be prevailed upon to overwhelm the "misguided" voters who support the government's policy. We understand that the rationale to be implemented in justifying this action is to be found in the statistical impropriety of a 22 per cent turnout with an invalidating concentration of voters from the residence area. Such a vote is not representative of the entire student population.

We will not tolerate an arrogant administration which will ignore its constituents when it suits their purpose. If in fact the AMS chooses not to represent their recently curried position, we will call for several resignations from office. The AMS has no alternative but represent the position solicited from and now rendered by the students.

2 profs say: PQ leaders "moderates"

by Paul Henderson

The Parti Quebecois won Monday's election by dint of its ability to maintain a narrow range of policy proposals directed at a specific interest group—namely the industrial working class. Such was the conclusion of a panel discussion conducted Saturday morning under the auspices of the Political Studies Department. The panel, including Professors J. de Wilde, W.P. Irvine, P. M. Leslie and graduate student Raymond Duden, analyzed the structure of the PQ and attempted to see why the separatist party won Monday's election.

Piles & Chuckles - Pardon my posture
Necrophelia isn't dead as was discovered at Meds Variety Night held last Friday and Saturday nights at Grant Hall.

Dr Irvine described PQ strategy as that of a depth strategy whereby one homogeneous group is identified within society which the party leadership then concentrates solely on. In this way, the party does not attract any groups which may divert it from its political objectives. The PQ did this as shown by the results in which, as Dr Irvine pointed out, "the bulk of the constituencies reflected the interests of the industrial working class."

Parrott cares but ducks questions

by Chris Hall

I want to project the image of caring for the individual student," Dr. Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, stated in a meeting with OFS-FEO executive and staff members on November 18th. The meeting was arranged in order to discuss the current backlog in OSAP awards and the methods to be employed in determining who is a visa student and therefore liable to pay the differential fee.

To date, approximately 7,000 students have yet to receive their money from OSAP. Many of these students have had to survive half the school year without money to pay fees. One University of Guelph student has had to live in a tent while waiting for his money to come through. Dr Parrott stated that this backlog in loans is due to shortages of manpower. "It will be another month at least before all the loans are completely processed and sent out."

However, Dr Parrott did promise personal intervention on those cases of outstanding need, like the Guelph student, if he was notified of their predicament. The meeting also saw further discussion on OSAP summer savings requirements. OFS-FEO has stated their opposition to this policy which sets an amount of money a student in a particular faculty or degree program will earn during the summer. In many cases, these amounts are inconsistent with what the majority of the students will actually earn. Dr Parrott reiterated his earlier position on the summer saving requirements by stating that this policy will not be changed.

The discussion concerning student loans ended on a more positive note. Dr Parrott voiced his support for localizing the student loans in the future, so students will have their money before Christmas. "We'll get through this year without remodelling the system. However, I am in favour of overhauling the system by decentralizing it."

Dr Parrott also stated that the differential fees for international students will not be discarded, even though the OFS-FEO opposes it as being unfair. The methods of implementing requirements for proof of Canadian citizenship have yet to be decided. As it stands now, Canadians will have to prove their citizenship at registration. When asked if the administrative costs will exceed the money gained by the differential fees Dr Parrott did not give any concrete answers. "The government feel they are right in establishing differential fees for foreign students, regardless of the costs," Hugh Christie reported.

Hugh Christie, the AMS External Affairs Commissioner and an OFS-FEO representative at the meeting, said Dr Parrott was not overly helpful. "If ever a brick wall could talk Parrott would be that wall. I found the meeting to be very frustrating in terms of obtaining any concrete answers in regard to the issues confronting students of Ontario Universities."

Yet oddly enough, as it was remarked, the voting base which the PQ attracts was broadened by the middle-class suburbanite. Dr Irvine added moreover as the close cases in these constituencies reveal, that the middle class is "not as single-minded as the working class."

Indeed, there was some debate as to the diversity of classes beyond the working class from which the PQ drew most of its support. Raymond Duden asserted that it was the new petty bourgeoisie comprising, according to him, psychologists, managers, teachers and foremen which constituted an important element of PQ support. Dr de Wilde was unhappy with this definition calling it a "catch all" phrase which contains far too diverse groups from which to be able to draw any concrete conclusions. At Duden then backed down somewhat and stated that in fact the PQ was able to draw from every class in Quebec and that therein lay its strength. Parrott was seen to be a result of the impressive calibre of leadership of the PQ.

In his analysis of the structure of the PQ, Dr Leslie observed that when the party was founded in 1968, it attracted adherents from a very wide ideological base, from the conservative right wing through the liberal reformist to the socialist left wing. Dr Leslie stressed, however, that "the real leadership, including Rene Levesque, represents the more moderate elements of the PQ." Dr de Wilde elaborated upon this analysis of the division between the leadership and what he called the mass party base. The former contains those technocrats who seek independence because federalism, as a form of government, is inefficient, while the latter contend that federalism is too efficient, representing only the interests of Anglo-Canadian capital. Both professors related those critics who feel that given these wide divergencies the PQ will not be able to hold together through the four years of its mandate. The prime objective of independence will override, in the short run, these ideological tensions.

Quebec unions call PQ win "victory for the common man"

by Annette Nicholson

The Quebec unions are more concerned with economic problems rather than with separatism," said Professor Carla Lipsig-Mummé of Concordia University, since in the last eight years "they have taken an economic heating." They are not doing anything radical in the political arena at all, she said, despite their radical ideology.

Prof Lipsig-Mummé spoke Friday on the history of the politicization of the Quebec trade union movement. She said that, in the view of union leaders in Quebec, the PQ victory of November 15 was a victory for the ordinary man, although the Quebec Federation of Labour (QFL) was the only union to openly support and collaborate with the Parti Quebecois. The PQ have given no organized role to the unions, but have accepted union support with "no strings attached," noted Lipsig-Mummé.

In her view "the QFL will try to recreate the Quiet Revolution - but with it playing the preferential role with the government that the CNTU played with the Liberals in the sixties."

In outlining the history of the politicization of the unions, Lipsig-Mummé pointed out that since there is no workers' party in Quebec, politicization has grown out of concrete struggles in labour-management relations.

She spoke of five stages of union political activity: the first, 1894-1907, marked the end of active union participation in workers' parties; the second, 1907-1944, was a regression in the economic power and political force of the unions; the third, 1944 to the death of Duplessis in 1959, was characterized by repressive labour legislation, use of provincial police to break strikes and the growing political opposition of the unions. In the years 1959-1967, the Quiet Revolution, the state's role in Quebec society and economy grew along with public sector employment. It was a time, according to Lipsig-Mummé, of a liberalized labour code and increased political intervention through lobbying, for the unions. Lipsig-Mummé's last stage, 1967-1976, is one of "union domestication," through the slowdown of Quebec's economic growth, the loss of momentum of the Quiet Revolution, the increasingly repressive role of the state and confusion and competition within the unions.

Mayor Speal: thoughts on governing Kingston

by Maben Smith

If there was ever a period of time in which the duties of the Mayor of Kingston were most enviable, it must surely have just passed.

In the four years of his term in office, Kingston's Mayor George Speal has had the privilege of being host not only during the Tercentenary year, but more recently during the Sailing Events of the twenty-first Olympiad. On both occasions, visits by the Queen and members of her family were made. With the conclusion of the Mayor's term approaching, and since he will not be seeking re-election, the Journal interviewed him with the hope of gaining some feeling about his experience.

There is no doubt in Speal's mind that both Royal visits were highlights of these four years. In 1973 he entertained the Queen and Prince Philip and in 1976 he was invited aboard the Britannia in return. Aside from his personal pleasure however, he feels the city has gained appreciably from the attention given to it during these events. Furthermore, he points out the greatest benefit of both Tercentenary and the Olympics, lies in the change in atmosphere in Kingston. Traditionally, Kingston is a conservative city, quite often lacking in community spirit. Mayor Speal is positive that community spirit is higher now, evidenced by increased involvement in city affairs.

He is pleased to note progress towards the reconstruction of some of the main city streets. The construction of housing for the aged, the first phase of a new library, the purchase of waterfront land allowing public access to the river, and the proven interest in commercial redevelopment-renovation projects, are all, according to Speal, a reflection of his government.

Particularly important are two trial studies in the city that have proven successful and are being expanded to other parts of Canada. The Neborhood Improvement Plan has provided one-and-a-half million dollars for use in the city as individual neighbourhoods see fit. The Work Activity Projects have attempted to constructively involve the unemployed. The total picture, according to the Mayor, is one in which the citizens are now more concerned with the life of their community. They appear more willing to participate in the city's development.

Asked whether he felt there was any pressing business that would have to be left undone at the end of his term, the Mayor says he has prepared a list for his successor, outlining his recommendations. He would like to see the road construction project continued to its proper completion; he would like to see a national sailing school established in Kingston, and continuation of the Festival Kingston Month. The latter he notes, has been made feasible by a $22,000 surplus from the Olympic cultural events budget.

Two other pieces of business are outstanding. The Mayor has had one informal meeting with the reeves of two related townships, but would like to see all four municipalities included. Such a meeting of the mayor and four reeves, would prove to be of substantial importance in planning for the entire Kingston area. Secondly, Speal would like to see the successful completion of a number of development proposals. He feels the city must nurture them, without giving any legal or financial commitments. In particular, he feels the Place D'Armes project is most appreciated by City Hall, but the desire for exclusiveness made by the developers is unreasonable and beyond the proper bounds of a public body. Speal feels free enterprise must continue, therefore, any cooperation beyond moral support of the developers is out of line. He maintains that a climate does exist within the city's governing body that is conducive to large developments.

Insofar as the future of the city is concerned, Mayor Speal cannot help but think the recent upswing in development will continue for more than just the next few years. Speal believes the pleasant surroundings are a natural drawing card. More importantly, the large amount of construction now being carried on in the "golden horseshoe" (Niagara Peninsula) is demonstrating the need for development in non-agricultural areas such as ours. This he hopes will result in a controlled growth.

Mayor Speal appears happy to relinquish his position, but he will not withdraw totally from community affairs.

Kingston -- It's Your City Too!

Here's how to vote in the municipal elections:

With some minor exceptions - You are eligible to vote if you were resident in Kingston between September 7th and October 12th, are a Canadian citizen or British subject, and are eighteen on or before voting day.

Voters' List
Voters' lists were posted in each polling subdivision. Check to see if your name is included. A map of the polling subdivisions and location of polls will be published in the Whig Standard the Saturday before the election.

If your name was omitted:
(1) Obtain a certificate indicating your right to vote. This must be sworn before a Commissioner of Oath, i.e. the City Clerk, lawyer, or member of City Council. Forms are obtainable from candidates or at City Hall and approved by the Returning Officer at City Hall.

(2) Present yourself at the poll as being entitled to vote, take a declaration that you are eligible, and establish your identification to the satisfaction of the deputy returning officer. A Queen's student card should be sufficient. There are severe penalties for false declarations.

Interprovincial Second-Language Monitor Program

This program allows university-level students in Canada to study full-time and to work part-time as second-language monitors, usually in provinces other than their own. Monitors assist primary and secondary school, second-language teachers in conversation and pronunciation classes.

At least 500 students will each receive a minimum of $3,000 for nine months of participation and will be reimbursed for one return trip home.

This interprovincial program is financed by the Department of the Secretary of State.

Heavy drinking contributes to V. D.?

OTTAWA [CUP] - Media reports that Carleton University students drank an average of 38 gallons of beer each last year for a total of 1.3 million to the student association.

"Carleton is being picked on," said student president Scott Mullin, because it lacks access to nearby pubs unlike the downtown University of Ottawa.

"We only provide the pubs. We do not coerce students into getting pissed to the gills," he said.

Manager of liquor operations Ron Mertens challenged contentions by health services that heavy campus drinking caused venereal disease and unwanted pregnancies. He said it alcohol leads to promiscuity it's the immaturity of the drinker not the availability of alcohol.

Mertens said if pub staff notice someone is "well on his way" that person is cut off and ushered out of the facility.

He also challenged beer consumption statistics.

"Sure the regulars here may well have consumed 38 gallons each. But that's not the average. The average works out to about 5 gallons each for the students, faculty and staff using Carleton's liquor outlets. And considering about 5,000 people without Carleton identification drink here each year, the average per Carleton student drinker is more like four gallons."

According to Faculty Club assistant John St. James one group of professors might spend $300 to $400 on drinks there on Friday evenings.

Since the club is a private institution it does not have to release its profit and consumption figures.

St. James added since "this is basically a social club and they all know each other very well... there's lots of promiscuity and permissiveness."

Few women hired at western universities
[CUP Winnipeg] - Fewer women academics in Western Canadian Universities are getting tenure in 1976 than 20 years ago, and few are being hired for any academic posts in western universities.

Those are some of the conclusions of M. faculty rep Lorna Sandler reached after attending a Canadian Association of University teachers (CAUT).

The main reason fewer women were being hired, Sandler said, is due to tightening of university budgets, due to government cutbacks. Due to the abundance of already tenured profs, the majority of whom are male, women profs have a harder time getting tenured, or any faculty position, as money available for hiring decreases. Some departments even give preferential treatment to males.

The conference asked that universities move to unisex mortality and actuarial tables in calculation pensions. Present tables differentiate on the basis of sex, expecting that women will live longer than men. The result is that women receive less money per year for pensions, because it is assumed they will live longer than men and they collect for a longer time.

However, according to Sandler studies show that 84 percent of women do not live longer than men, so the pension scheme is unfair.

Enrollment restrictions save tax money
OTTAWA [CUP] - York University president Ian MacDonald says he wants to ensure greater accessibility to university and defend the quality of university education.

Greater accessibility for low income people is the "major priority" MacDonald said. Poorer students must not only face economic barriers but have cultural, linguistic and attitudinal hurdles to climb as well, MacDonald said.

He said the basic reasoning behind enrolment restrictions is to save taxpayer's money. He challenged this rationale saying most of the university's costs, such as building maintenance and salaries for tenured professors, are fixed.

Macdonald tied cutbacks in university financing to a drop in the quality of education. In York's case, he pointed out, enrolment has increased about 5 percent each year during the 1970's while the teaching staff remained constant. The connection between the resulting larger classes and poorer education is not always direct, he said, but larger classes must have an "impact".

But presidents Dr. W. Cochrane (Calgary) and Ralph Campbell (Manitoba) see limited enrolment and higher admission standards as the solution to declining quality.

The public can expect higher admission standards at universities across Alberta, W. Cochrane said Nov. 6. A decrease in government funding makes it necessary to limit enrolment, he said.

Macdonald said he sees more and more people entering university at various stages in their careers. This is a "second chance" for learning, he said, and will become increasingly important in Canada's changing economy.

Kingston landowners donation

Candidate Spence refuses $5000

Mayoralty candidate Kit Spence refused an offer from a major land developer in Kingston to finance the Queen's student's entire campaign. Campaign worker Terry Macli said that Spence refused the offer of $5000 because he didn't want to be indebted to anyone for such a large amount.

"It's frightening," Macli said. "You just have to look at the composition of the City Council to tell that it's controlled by land developers. You just don't have long term planning," asserted Macli.

The developer was not identified but Macli said that the man was trying to defeat candidate Ken Keyes, a member of the City of Kingston Planning Board, was influential in scuttling a major project on Montreal Street in which the landowner had a large interest.

Although Spence would not accept the offer of $5000, a small sum was placed on account at the Whig Standard for the student's advertising campaign. This was subsequently withdrawn altogether and Kit now has an $85 bill at the Whig Standard, which Macli says is being paid for by $100 from the AMS.

Are we free to make a choice?

by Jennifer Warren
Ms. M.E. Meyer, of the Department of Sociology, will address herself to the question of Freedom and Choice, tonight at 7:30 p.m. in the Brockington House Common Room. She will discuss this theme, using Sartre's notion of Freedom as the ability to ultimately determine one's destiny through choice.

Ms. Meyer, Chairwoman of Undergraduate Studies, will suggest that on one hand we are not animals, as we do make decisions, but on the other hand, there are pressures on our decisions of which we are not always aware. Parallels will also be drawn between the choices which our generation is called upon to make, and those which our parents' generation had to make.

Ms. Meyer will be speaking as the fourth lecturer in the Last Lecture Series. Information on the lecturers, including the time and location of the lectures, is posted around campus.

Fitness to be improved by "persuasion & negotiation"

by Ross Bartlett

The basic goals of Canada's health policies in the past twenty years and those which will continue to shape policies in the future are: "the highest possible degree of well being and physical and mental development in the individuals in our society within the limits of available resources, and the greatest possible equity with regard to the means of attaining that development and well-being."

So says Marc Lalonde, Minister of National Health and Welfare. He made the remarks during the course of an address to a recent Canadian-American seminar at the University of Windsor. The reason for making such "basic" statements is Lalonde's fear that "we too often get bogged down in details."

Lalonde asserts that "the past twenty years in Canada have been characterized medically speaking by the development of hospital insurance (1957) and medical insurance (1966). As a result, all Canadians are completely insured for hospital and medical care under public schemes."

Indeed, so pleased are the authorities with their system that "any retrograde step in the form of halting or even reducing these programs is absolutely unthinkable." Further evolution of the system will "lead to increasing provincial administrative responsibility." This will lead to a role of the federal government "as essentially that of ensuring an equitable transfer of financial resources to the provinces and guaranteeing the maintenance of certain national standards with regard to the quality and accessibility of care."

Lalonde feels that governmental policy should now move into the area of "primary prevention." In this regard he spoke specifically of "motor vehicle accidents, heart disease, other accidents, respiratory diseases (primarily lung cancer) and suicides. These five causes account for 60 percent of premature mortality - that is between the ages of one and seventy."

The attack must be made on the risk factors involved in these areas. "In the case of motor vehicle accidents - mainly the abuse of alcohol, excessive speed and failure to wear seatbelts. In the case of heart disease - heavy smoking, inappropriate diet and probably lack of physical exercise. In the case of other accidents - employer and employee negligence, negligence in the home and excessive drinking. In the case of respiratory disease - smoking, of course, but also the quality of air on the job and in the urban community. Finally, in the case of suicides - factors such as the tensions of modern life, influences in early life and alcohol, may be identified among others."

The two major goals in the coming years are therefore "improvement of the social and physical environment, and modification of certain living habits that influence the level of health fitness." These changes may be however, "outside the health system, systems that are therefore beyond our direct authority in the present socio-political context." Lalonde is confident that the appropriate actions may be undertaken "through persuasion and negotiation," admittedly extremely complex. He points to the efforts to make the "wearing of automobile seat belts compulsory and reduce speed limits" as examples of such changes.

The Minister insists that such legislation must avoid "authoritarianism and manipulation...which represent the two major reefs which the ship of State must avoid in any social intervention intended to influence the behaviour of its citizens."

On self-motivation and/or paranoia

Have you ever thought that you were acting rightly for the wrong reason or, conversely, wrongly for the right reason? These are interesting questions for they focus on the essence of our actions.

With exams approaching and essays coming due, this is an appropriate time to ask what is the main motivation behind a student's work. Ideally, it is that he has a desire to expand his knowledge, improve his writing abilities, learn self-discipline, and (believe it or not!) generally enjoy his studies. But is this the case? More often than not, a student is driven by fear that he will not measure up to his own expectations or the expectations of those around him—that he will not attain an "A" or a "B" standing. Of course, this is not true for all students and, indeed, most individuals would deny that their sense of worth is based on such a superficial criteria like marks.

Unfortunately, marks (and the pursuit of them) play a very significant role in our system of education. In public school, they may have determined the location of your desk in the classroom. For example, the upper left hand corner was the "A" student and the lower right was the "D" student. In high school and university, marks may determine the course of a person's career, especially if he wishes to be a doctor or a lawyer. Consequently, a destructively competitive spirit is often aroused among those individuals who wish to be selected for these courses.

As an objective(?) measurement of a student's ability, marks are not wrong. But they are not good in so far

Eleanor Bartlett for NDP

Face reality by voting Dec. 6

A confidential source informs me that about 22 percent of the Queen's student population voted in the last Kingston civic election. That figure does not exceed or fall short of the percentage of city residents who voted in the same election. Is it possible, then, that not all Queen's students are totally indifferent to the city of Kingston?

People living in the REAL world often criticize university students for living in an ivory tower. According to this argument, the university student scorns to consider the way real people function in their everyday lives. Instead, the student concerns himself with what he describes as more profound questions. Battered with this feeling of intellectual superiority, he avoids contact with as they are externalized from the actual work and can become an end in themselves, rather than a measurement of real worth. Our educational system and, more generally, our society nurtures letism whereby external things, like marks, take on a value which they do not actually possess. Thus, it is a tragedy that many lives are spent in pursuit of the wrong goals. In school, it is that elusive "A." In work, it is pursuit of that inflated "dollar" which can buy larger houses, bigger cars and, in effect, social status. In our pursuit of external things, one which is characteristic of this society, an understanding of true value is lost. It can only be found if we question the motivation behind our actions.

It is important to question not only our own actions, but also our role in society, the purpose of the university, etc. At the risk of being yawned at, (but in the hope of being responded to!), Margaret Churcher and I have begun "A Voice From the Cloister" so that we may discuss the above and other related topics. The column will appear most Tuesdays.

Certainly, Queen's is physically set apart from the city of Kingston. Queen's students do tend to socialize with their peers to the exclusion of non-students. And the academic activities pursued here may seem completely unconnected with the activities of Kingstonians. But most of us, at some point in each day, cross the social and physical frontier between university and city. In many ways, we function as Kingstonians. We must make consumer purchases which may or may not be time-consuming depending on the zoning by-laws. Many of us live in houses that do or do not comply with municipal building by-laws. The availability of street lighting enhances or limits our safety walking along Kingston streets at night. Maximum speed limits on city streets affect our safety when we try to cross intersections or when we attempt to change lanes while riding our bicycles.

I could think of many more instances when we as students behave as REAL people. What all the activities described above have in common is that they are affected by the decisions municipal officers hold. If other students feel as I do, that many of our concerns are identical to some of the concerns of Kingstonians, then we have a stake in this community. We should be concerned with which people are elected to municipal council, school board, and Public Utilities Commission.

In the next few weeks, many municipal candidates will make themselves known to their potential electors in Sydenham ward, Bill Knapp and the incumbents Terry French and Lois Miller are contesting the two aldermanic positions. In Ontario ward, John Clements and the incumbents Gord Allmark and David Travers are contesting the two aldermanic positions. Whether you meet them at your door, in residence cafeterias or if you find their campaign literature in your mailbox, pay attention to them. If you can confidently select the best people for the various offices, then vote on December 6. Polls will be held in the various residences and in other conveniently located places throughout the wards.

One final word check a voters' list posted in your residence, near your home, or contact the Deputy Clerk's office at 546-4291. If your name is not on the list, it can be added to the list by going to the Deputy Clerk's office at City Hall or by contacting one of the candidates in your ward. They can administer the same formality. As a last resort, you can be sworn in as a voter at an election-day poll.

Today, John Allen Fraser, the Progressive Conservative Labour Critic in the House of Commons is visiting the city of Kingston and Queen's.

Mr. Fraser, 43, has been a member of the Progressive Conservative Party for the past 25 years and has served the Vancouver South Riding since 1972. Since his election, Mr. Fraser has been a member of the Standing Committees on Fishing and Forestry, on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, and on Natural Resources. He served as the House of Commons Environment Critic prior to his becoming Labour Critic.

As Labour Critic, Mr. Fraser believes that it is only fundamental to the Conservative philosophy that the public interest must come first. Therefore in a labour conflict which involves the public interest, the public interest must come first, and the basic right of a worker to strike must come second. "We cannot allow a stoppage of our essential services to cripple the economy of the country."

Furthering this, Mr. Fraser does not believe that labour demands have caused inflation. It was caused, he says, by government excesses but notes labour demands which are clearly excessive cannot be accepted especially during this extremely difficult period in our country's history.

Mr. Fraser feels strongly opposed to increased government spending but sees it as essential in order to combat crime, and in particular organized crime. "It is a fundamental responsibility of government to ensure that we have security and peace on our streets and whatever that takes in terms of energies and money, it is a price that must be paid."

On productivity and national industrial policy, a government committed to the private sector is absolutely necessary. "If Canadians are to build their own productivity base, and to have their own ownership as well, then our tax structure must be geared to encourage investment", and where it would benefit Canada he would encourage foreign investment and governmental aid to industry, especially that of smaller businesses and that the enterprise would be able to pull its own weight after getting assistance.

Mr. Fraser also feels that government should not participate in the development of industries such as the petroleum industry.

Touching on a little different issue, Mr. Fraser sees it unrealistic to expect all Canadians to be bilingual. He supported the Languages Act in belief that it would enable Canadians, of either French or English tongues to better communicate with their federal government. Knowing the French language himself, Mr. Fraser feels it to be an important attribute to our national life.

In view of limited space, I would strongly encourage you to come and discuss his views and yours, personally, today, from 4 to 5:30 in the Second Floor Common Room of the Student Union SEE YOU THERE!

The Queen's Journal Tuesday, November 23, 1976

We are selfish, blind

by R. A. Hackett

No, it's not a scene from an Edward Albee play. In an opinion poll last week, 2,400 Queen's students actually did vote nearly three to one against the principle of free tuition, and two to one in favour of differential fees for foreign students. As one faculty member put it, it's enough to make a body want to pack up and leave immediately.

Perhaps he was wrong. Perhaps Queen's students were motivated by humanitarian and egalitarian instincts. Perhaps it was reasoned that free tuition would impose an unnecessary tax burden on lower and middle income earners, or that if we want to spend Canadian tax dollars on "foreign aid," we'd do better to contribute directly to impoverished nations.

Perhaps. But given our past political record, there aren't many grounds for optimism in this regard.

In any case, such reasoning would have been misguided. Higher fees for foreign students discriminates against those countries which do not pursue a similar policy in relation to Canadian students. Possibly there's a case to be made for bilateral agreements, but surely Canadian capitalism has reaped sufficient profit from its investments in southern Africa, or Brazil, or the West Indies, that this country can afford to train the small group of Third World students who come here, as well as contribute a significant amount of genuine developmental assistance.

And as for tuition, is it necessary to re-hash the arguments discussed on National Student Day? We know that tuition fees are far from the major costs associated with post-secondary education; there are books and living expenses plus the loss of foregone income during the university years.

Faced with such financial obstacles, many public school students from lower or moderate income families have to give up on the idea of continuing their studies. Student aid has failed to solve this problem; much student aid is in the form of loans which are a disincentive to working class students, as they are understandably reluctant to assume a large debt to finance their education. In any case, why should they and their families be burdened with a large debt, while more affluent students can graduate with no loans to repay?

Who stands to benefit? Free tuition would make it easier for those students whose parents support them both during the summer and through the academic year, since these individuals are not eligible for OSAP. It would mean that university would be even more alluring to them as a place to put off the inevitable day of initiation into the world of work.

As well, consider who would pay? The advocates say that the big corporations would. However, if taxed in this manner corporations would quickly respond by raising their prices. Then, because, as a group poor people pay a higher percentage of their income for goods than other groups, they would be the ultimate source of the tuition which very few of them, due to several factors, ever have the opportunity to benefit from.

Thus, an even heavier burden would be placed on the poor, to support the progressively prolonged education of a class who would then use the "extra" cash provided by the luxury of free tuition to enjoy more ski trips to the Alps and Florida vacations during the breaks in the academic year.

Isadora Lodge

Porter provides enormous documentation of the fact that higher education, much of it publicly subsidized, is largely a privilege of the upper classes. For instance, in 1956 over 1/4 of university students had fathers who were proprietors, managers, or professionals; only 5 percent came from labourers' families, even though this group made up over 20 percent of the population. A 1957 Ontario study showed that 1/4 of those who don't go to university, largely due to lack of money, have better high-school records than 1/4 of those who do. There's little reason to believe the situation has improved, indeed, given recent government cutbacks and high unemployment (especially the lack of summer jobs), discrimination against non-affluent students may have worsened.

Furthermore, working people should not bear the tax brunt of free tuition. The major beneficiaries of a highly-skilled labour force, the corporations, should.

There are all kinds of factors (peer group pressure, differences in academic ability, expectations and motivation due to early socialization; unequal facilities in different areas) associated with the regional and class structure which ensure that inequality of economic condition breeds inequality of opportunity over the generations. While we cannot have an open and democratic education system without a democratic and classless society, abolition of tuition fees would be at least a first faltering step in this direction.

In describing Canadians' elitist attitudes to education, Pierre Berton once wrote that "Surely future generations will see this one as we see the diehards of 1848 (who opposed free common schools), selfish, narrow, short-sighted men, unable to grasp the vision of the future, imprisoned by a bookkeeping attitude to life, creeping silently and blindly along at the tag end of the parade of progress." If the majority really thought through the ramifications of their vote last week, one can only conclude that most of us are prepared to see Canadian campuses preserved as "pastures for the privileged."

Disturbed

Dear Editor,

I am very disturbed by the results of the two recent referenda. The overwhelming rejection of free post-secondary tuition and approval of differential fees for foreign students indicates a hypocritical, insular attitude on the part of the Queen's student body.

First, with regards to the issue of free post secondary tuition, many if not most Queen's students are sheltered from the harsh financial realities of meeting the costs of a university education by their relatively affluent parents. Furthermore, a large part of the actual costs of instruction and facilities is covered by funds from the federal and provincial governments and from alumni. Public monies at one time covered two-thirds of total expenses but recent increases in tuition have lowered this share. It strikes me as hypocritical that students should howl at increases in fees and yet be unwilling to have these same costs removed.

It is common knowledge (so one would think) that this little planet is becoming increasingly beset with problems of global dimensions. It is thus difficult on both practical and moral grounds to adopt narrow, nationalistic attitudes. The proposed increase in tuition fees for foreign students will prevent many non-Canadians from studying in this province. It is a fact that much of the finest research on this campus is being carried on by foreign students. Is it fear of competition in the "grades market" or job market which prompted Queen's students to vote as they did? An even more disturbing interpretation of the results is that students here want to preserve some sort of cultural or racial homogeneity.

Both referenda boil down to the same issue: do we at Queen's support equality of educational opportunity regardless of social background or nationality? It should be noted that only about one quarter of the student body voted in these two referenda. I hope that the majority of Queen's students do not agree with the results.

Council now lacks credibility

Dear Editor,

Hurrah! The referendum - er, sorry, "opinion poll" is over, and those "uninformed" students have indicated by almost a 3-1 margin that they don't believe in the principle of free tuition. So now the AMS, because of the actions of the Outer Council, is still allowed to support a policy that only 23 percent of the students that voted are for. No wonder the OCS is facing a credibility problem and flagging interest at the university level this year (witness Western's withdrawal) as its delegates continue to believe in Utopian policies that the general public and government laugh at, and the people that its supposed to represent don't even support.

I would like to venture a theory that most of the students who take the trouble to vote on referendums and in elections are those who really care, and because of their interest, are in fact quite informed about the issues involved. The students who don't care, on the other hand, simply don't vote. This is indicated by the perennial low turnout for any referendums or elections.

If this is not the case, I would like to leave the members of the Outer Council with one last thought - those "uninformed" students who shouldn't be trusted with forming your policies are the same students who elected you during the last elections. Maybe they shouldn't have been trusted with that job either!

McQueen missed

Dear Editor,
While I am glad that Mr. John McQueen appreciated my effort to clarify the problem of "political apathy" at Queen's I am afraid that he has missed the main line of my argument.

In his letter Journal, November 19, Mr. McQueen states that I "lambaste" Mr. David for advocating the "status quo" (I never used the phrase status quo; this was the title the editor saw fit to put above my letter. I referred, rather, to the established political order. It was not my intent to either criticize (lambaste) or defend the established political order, this was not the issue. My criticisms of Mr. David were directed at his conscious defence of political apathy, not his tacit support of the status quo. I merely stated that "political apathy is tacit support of the established political order and, as such, is a political opinion."

I made no judgement about the merits of the established political order I anticipated this by noting, "There will be no criticism of injustice or stupidity in the political order (where political apathy predominates)". I did not claim our established political order, or any other established political order for that matter, was unjust or stupid. I merely claimed that political apathy would permit injustice and stupidity to exist where and when it occurs.

Many reasonable people defend, advocate, and, to use Mr. McQueen's word, "extol" various established political orders. This does not mean, as Mr. McQueen suggests, that they have uncritically accepted a particular political-economic ideology. A conservative political ideology is not, necessarily, an uncritical or unreflective viewpoint. It is, rather, to have a political viewpoint which may or may not be justifiable. It is not, however, to be politically critical, reflective, and committed is not synonymous with opposing the established political order or claiming it is unjust or stupid. I suggested that intelligent government, freedom, and democracy (whether one values them or not) will perish in the wake of widespread political apathy. This is not identifiable with an uncritical acceptance of the established political order.

Mr. McQueen claims I referred to Mr. David as an authoritarian. This is not true. I said that the consequences of widespread political apathy would be an authoritarian administrative regime. Mr. McQueen described Mr. David as "merely another fascist"; this is, I think, empty rhetoric which is grossly unfair. Someone who is politically apathetic is self-evidently not a "fascist".

AMS constables inconsistent

Dear Editor,
It is a wonder there hasn't been more attention placed on the A.M.S. constables' actions at sports events, besides the job of frisking spectators. What I have seen at every Gael's hockey game in the arena is a misuse, by a number of constables, of the authority given to them.

The track in the arena is restricted against anyone wearing street shoes. That is a posted rule of which the constables are aware. Yet in every game, I have seen constables being pressured into letting a few people walk on the track as a shorter route to the Queen's bleachers. But the next group that comes along is severely reprimanded and told to use the stairs rather than the track. On more than one instance the constables saw the spectators walk right behind them, on the track, and took no action whatsoever.

What kind of constables are these, who are so inclined to use such preferential treatment? Is this the way we can expect the law to be enforced at other events around campus? It is obvious they are going to have to work a lot harder to get the support they were asking for in September.

Novelty is refreshing

Dear Editor,

I suppose that there is something to be said for novelty and to that extent your editorial in Friday's Journal discouraging student participation in the upcoming municipal election was somewhat refreshing. The basis of your argument however is simply not a valid one. You state for example that students do not have "a vested interest" in many issues concerning the community. This does seem a slightly odd thing to say.

If, for example, you are a student living in off-campus housing and you don't have a fire escape it is because municipal by-laws providing for such things apply only to very narrowly defined "boarding houses" and not to leaseholds which are held by students as joint tenants. Efforts to change this by-law would benefit not only students but all tenants in the city.

If you are female and are afraid to walk about certain areas of the city at certain times or if you are one of the hundreds of persons who have had their stereos and/or bicycles stolen you might have an interest in seeing if the crime rate could be lowered. How can the crime rate be lowered? One way would be to get people back to work in this town by encouraging industries (small ones not smokestacks) to settle in Kingston. Here again this interest and concern meshes with the interests and concerns of Kingstonians.

If you plan to stay in Kingston during the summer wouldn't it be nice to find a summer job? A mayor who would promote the tourist industry might be welcome in this respect. The list of these issues can continue. For example, do you ride the buses? Do you shop downtown?

Now then, if none of the above issues or questions existed then your editorial might make some sense. As it stands however, your editorial is somewhat akin to urging people not to express an opinion in their own safety and comfort and well-being as well as the safety and comfort and well-being of those who live in the community with them.

As was mentioned at the beginning of this letter, novelty is refreshing. In this regard then let's quit dumping on Kingston and try to do something positive for this city by voting on December 6.

DSC's: no smoking!

Dear Editor,

Might I suggest that the time is now ripe to remind the numerous boors who insist on polluting my lungs and blowing smoke in my face, that smoking is not supposed to be allowed in classrooms. Perhaps I am being somewhat idealistic; after all, if students are going to be so ignorant as to talk (loudly) through entire lectures, and insist on tapping their feet against the back of my chair or wiping their shoes on my coat, then why should I expect them to consider my rights when it comes down to not smoking?

Still, as a sociology major, I do find it annoying that in my two required courses there is widespread smoking. In Soc 222 over half the class regularly lights up; at least in Soc 221 only half a dozen or so show their damned stupidity.

I realize that professors and DSC reps have other jobs than enforcing rules but since everybody seems to be mentioning that the student body doesn't take the idea of DSC's seriously, might I suggest that I find it hard to do so when they refrain from mentioning the non-smoking rule to the class.

Virginity rehash

Dear Editor

It was to be expected that someone would misconstrue Howard Smith's article "Virginity's a social disease", as an advocacy of a "sexual free-for-all" as stated by Wendy Logan. Howard Smith is merely investigating the place of virginity as a value in modern society. He is inquiring about the value of the "women as a property of the male" idea and not whether or not a person engages in pre-marital sex should be a personal decision but when society imposes the "used model" concept, that person's freedom of choice is mitigated by social conditioning.

The equation of respectability with virginity has been (almost) replaced by equating respectability with an "acceptable" number of sexual experiences when it should have been completely eliminated. This transformation is taking a step up the ladder of social prejudices when we should be changing ladders. The basic concept of valuing someone on the basis of virginity is misfounded. Mr. Smith is really inquiring about the worth of such concepts. And no, Wendy Logan, he is not offering an alternative of promiscuity and "non-professional prostitution" but one of mature people, free from the restricting roles that such concepts impose on them. Both men and women are locked up in these roles and spend their life acting them out, guided by ancient ideas. How can women fight the reactions they themselves provoke in men by playing these roles? It certainly is not a convincing battle. "You better start swimming or you'll sink like a stone, for the times they are changing."

Who is this man? What is his platform?

Dear Sirs,

I am writing this letter in response to the tremendously juvenile editorial printed in the last issue of the Journal (9-11) which suggested that students stick their heads in the ground and ignore the upcoming civic election. In that editorial the writer calls into question not only the knowledge or students concerning the election, but even their ability to make a rational choice concerning the candidate.

I would like to urge the writer of that editorial to speak for himself. Many students are very interested in what happens in this election, indeed, at least two students are running for office. While I cannot vouch for Mr. Spence whom I have never met, I can speak for the sincerity, knowledge, ability, (and, yes, even rationality) of John Campey who is running for School Board.

Perhaps, though, the writer of that editorial did not mean his comments about student irrationality and what he meant to say was that students had no right to vote. After all, as he points out, the Victoria Hall poll seemed to have decided the election of an MPP Candidate in 1972, and this caused what the editorial author seems to think was understandable resentment among Kingston citizens. Should students not vote because Kingston residents might be offended? I imagine most of the members of the John Birch society were upset that the strong black vote elected Jimmy Carter a few weeks ago. Does that mean that American blacks shouldn't vote?

The fact of the matter is that students live in Kingston. We eat, sleep, shop and breathe in the same city. As full-time Kingston residents we have the right to vote in any and all elections held in this city. Rather than urge students not to vote, the Journal should be urging students to be responsible, to find out about the elections, to go to a poll on December 6th, and to vote.

What students have to say . . .

Maggie Chrzan

by Andrew Douglas

Recently a number of students were asked the following question: "What would be your reaction right now if you were approached by a United Way canvasser?" All those interviewed said they would contribute, but after some discussion pointed to a few doubts they had about the campaign.

Many echoed Maggie Chrzan's question, "Where do the funds go?" — a question answered by information elsewhere on this page. Another student wondered to what extent charitable agencies overlap, and if for example he had already supported the United Way by donating to the Cancer Association of the Heart Foundation.

While all those interviewed said they would contribute, most could cite reasons other than they might not want to. Trevor Ziebell believed the U.W. to be "the best" charity fund but could see how people might refuse to give because they disagreed with the aims of a single member-agency. He felt that abortion and other "isolated incidents" might prevent someone giving to a charitable fund with which they otherwise agreed. Peter Hubbard also felt that the abortion issue could confine donors. Several of those interviewed could think of no reasons for refusing to give. Barbara Woodside, when put 'on the spot', suggested that straitened personal finances could keep people from contributing.

Daria Prabhu felt that the only reason she would not give to a "charitable organization" is if she doubted its honesty. However, she hastened to add that she had not met such hucksters in Canada and was confident that her donation to the United Way would reach its proper goal. Donna McIlquham could understand why people might not give if they felt that their donation "doesn't serve the purpose they think it should." Though not objecting herself, she also felt that some people might protest the approach of anyone soliciting donations. Barbara Woodside felt that "canvassing is no bother to me"

One objection often raised about giving to a charitable organization such as the United Way is that the government should be able to do this as an extension of its welfare programme. Several of those interviewed would have agreed with Peter Hubbard that they "wouldn't care if it were a government or voluntary charity." Greg Morrow argued, however, that the present arrangement "cuts down government spending", while staff member Stewart Renfrew believed that personal participation is important. Donna McIlquham also objected to the idea of making the United Way an extension of the welfare system. She claimed that it would then be "too politically involved, and become a basis for getting votes" rather than for collecting money for charity. She wants to keep support for the United Way open as an option and not make the support of charity a matter of law, as it would be if it came out of your taxes. "People don't like being told to support something," she concluded, just as many react against wearing seat belts because they are forced to by law.

Stuart Renfrew

Trevor Ziebell

Donna McIlquham

Consider these four points

United Way's position on abortion. Of all the many aims, attitudes and opinions of the member agencies of the United Way that potential donors might object to, this is probably the most publicized. While each agency is free to support either side of the controversial issue over the right to abortion, the United Way does not support any agency whose principle aim is to condemn or to advocate abortion.

In one very well publicized instance in Toronto, the United Way refused to support an anti-abortion group. This was in keeping with the Appeal's policy of not taking sides in the issue. Some felt that by doing so the United Way was demonstrating solidarity with the other side, although it does not support a pro-abortion group either. It has been further argued that the Family Council Service is sympathetic with the right to abortion. Whether this is true or not, one must weigh this agency's view with those of the others who may or may not feel differently.

The United Way does not want to get involved in this controversial debate and so refuses to support one side against the other. As it is structured now, anybody should be able to support the United Way without feeling that they are supporting the opposite side in the controversy over abortion.

Cost of Organization. Some argue that by combining the campaign drives of 27 different agencies, the United Way represents a huge unwieldy organization that eats up too big a chunk of the donor's dollars. But imagine how many more people would be involved if each agency had to start from scratch in organizing its campaign, spreading publicity, obtaining volunteer and collecting donations.

As it is, all 27 work together under the auspices of the United Way which is composed totally of volunteers from the board of directors to the individual campaigner. Only the executive director and his small staff are paid for their work. The cost of the U.W. administration in 1975 amounted to only 8.42 percent of the previous year's campaign receipts. Considering the number of agencies and volunteers involved and the amount of collected (the 1976 objective was $432,000 for Kingston and District) is a very low proportion.

Mr. C. G. Provan, organizer of the U.W. campaign for the Queen's University, says he is always amused when people believe he gets a free lunch. He pointed out that the Board of Directors get no free luncheons and must get on their own time.

Considering the job that has been done, there is really no economical way of doing it.

People do not want to be disturbed by volunteers soliciting funds. People seem to associate the

The United Way should be conducted by the government.

Suggest some people who presumably feel they are working for the benefit of mankind. While many people would object to the increase in taxation and an increase in government intervention, we must recognize a number of other arguments.

As long as the U.W. is a voluntary, charitable organization, people can choose not to support it if they disagree with any of its objectives. But once it comes under government control they are compelled by law (in paying taxes) to support these same objectives. As some of these interviewed students pointed out, the United Way's value as an instrument for raising funds would be compromised by its potential as a political issue.

Besides, whoever said the government was keen on taking over the role of the United Way? There's little political sense in raising taxes to cover costs already met by volunteer labour.

As it stands now as a completely voluntary effort, there is an important ethical reward for every person involved whether a volunteer or donor.

If, on autumn days
When green leaves are slashed to blood;
And grey sky melts to grey sea,
I draw unto myself
Forgive me.

For as the autumn colours
I must brist wind and challenge winter's cold approach.
Demand, who are you?
Who touches my skin with such cold determination,
Who seizes summer's beauty and taints it with such rust?

Who are you, who settles to love me in chill nights
To sample autumn's golden sap
And toss my covers to sodden earth?
Stripped, I am loathed to your scrutiny.

But then, you cover me
With soft fur down of fallen birds and kisses raindrop wet
you smother me, submerge me.
And floating I catch my trodden leaves.

and readorned, I turn to you
If I look past you
At winter's whip
Will you understand?

The extravagant tradition of Queen's

by Terry Collins

The Science Formal is one of those aspects of Queen's that never really seems to change. Since 1900, the Science Formal has been the capstone dance for members of the Faculty of Applied Science.

In the earlier seventies, Playboy magazine cited the Formal as one of the grandest events in North America. There is little doubt of its stature in that regard.

This year's Formal cost roughly $7,000. The decorations alone, the theme for which was "Asgard" (the home of Norse gods), were constructed at a total cost of $3,300 and took two days to assemble in Grant Hall after two-and-a-half months of creative planning and construction. The decorations included a waterfall down the stairs in the main foyer of Grant Hall; the water from which temporarily welled into a mirrored pond on the dance floor.

The entrance was equally impressive: a black boat with portholes filled with fog formed the access to the foyer and costumed Norsemen and women were on hand to greet the arrivals and open the front doors under the windproofed canopy.

Murals of northern landscapes were complemented by sod and young evergreens as well as a scattering of hay on the floor.

All of this, naturally, was particularly impressive after having spent the first part of the evening sipping from what seemed like an inexhaustive supply of wines and champagnes at a private party organized for six couples. The party was at the Grey House, a handsome building a few steps from Victoria Hall, and was catered by Saga Foods (who served us a superb main course of roast beef. We had made a specific request that plates be used instead of fridges.)

The conversation flowed on about the unique appearance of the students that night, all in long gowns and the finest tails money can rent. I was struck by the extraordinary atmosphere in the room. Many hours and dollars had combined to create this setting; everyone relished the moment.

At Grant Hall, people waited in a long, slow moving queue to meet the receiving line. After stepping off the bridge couples were presented to Chancellor and Mrs. Michener, the Principal and Mrs. Watts, the Padre and Mrs. Lavery, Dr. and Mrs. Mackay, Mike Dick, who coordinated the Science Formal, his fiancée Ingrid, and Chris McNally, President of Eng. Soc. and his date, Wendy Hallett.

A black tunnel led from Grant to Kingston Hall, where detailed murals of landscapes disguised the academic classrooms and where waiters and waitresses busied about with trays of mixed drinks. This writer, throwing caution aside, alternated between Harvey Wallbangers and whiskey sours, taking little notice of drink selections as long as the colour was consistently yellow.

On the dance floor, several alcoves were created around the periphery of the room using the pillars of Grant Hall for support. These, again, were walled by murals and lit with coloured spotlights.

Music was provided by a multi-member orchestra who played at Oh Cha Cha during Homecoming last year. The atmosphere at the dance was warm, people were attentive and friendly, each looking at one another as though twenty years had passed and this was a reunion at Homecoming.

Michener with one of the yellow baseball caps of Science '77 which the Chancellor wore for a good deal of the rest of the dance.

The Science Formal has a long history of providing a great conclusion to one's stay at Queen's. Bands have always been top quality. A random sample of old Journals revealed that Count Basie played the Science Formal in 1939 and Glen Miller's Band did the honour eleven years ago. The 1939 Formal introduced the first use of total lighting which varied in intensity with Basie's music. The Padre related to a writer for Canadian Magazine two years ago that until recently the Formal were held on Friday night. The following morning the tradition was for dozens of men to show up at the football game still in top hats and tails.

In 1960, Malcolm Scott, then AMS President, was quoted by the Journal as saying "all this for only five hours enjoyment," a remark which was repeated this year by Mike Dick. Indeed, the dance is elaborate, expensive and tremendously time consuming. Is it worth it? Judging from the faces of the couples as they left the remains for the clean up crew, the dance was worth every bit of effort.

McArthur Dramatic Arts

The 'Real Inspector Hound' stands up

by Eric Hughes

Coming to the Duncan McArthur Hall Theatre this Wednesday through Saturday is the McArthur Dramatic Arts production of Tom Stoppard's The Real Inspector Hound. Stoppard is the modern British master of fancy in the theatre. He is not fundamentally a serious playwright, nor does he fall into farce. On the contrary, Stoppard never falls. He cleverly walks the tightrope between these two disparate media using a calculated intellectualism as a balancing pole. His plays rely heavily on well planned and equally well realized structural principals. The opening premise of a Stoppard play is inevitably ridiculous. From an opp-beat beginning, a syncopated rhythm is set to which the action of the rest of the play must conform. This is the essence of Stoppard's craft.

The Real Inspector Hound is a case in point. In this one-act comedy written in 1968, the framework is the play. The premise stems from a send-up of the conventions of detective fiction. Just as in his earlier hit Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are Dead, he breaks down the walls between real time and stage time. More recently, Peter Handke, the popular German playwright, has been able to carry this separation to its most far-fetched conclusion; the actors actually confront the audience with the fact that they are not watching a play. Stoppard is of necessity more subtle. His plays are written for audiences familiar with the classics and other established genre. Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are Dead takes two peripheral characters from Shakespeare's Hamlet and builds a story around their lives outside the one given us by the Bard. The Real Inspector Hound opens on two drama critics in the audience of some Agatha Christie-like mystery. As events unfold, they find themselves caught up in the action of the play and joining in the search for the homicidal maniac stalking the marshes around isolated Muldoon Manor. People change places in so totally logical a pattern that the nonsense becomes inevitable. The critics become inextricably locked into the mystery, both by way of their curiosity and their personal involvements with the other characters (as well as the body).

The McArthur production is directed by Larry O'Farrell of the Dramatic Arts Staff. Tickets are $2.00 general admission, and one dollar for students, and are available at the door.

At the Scarecrow

Mose Scarlett sings a Hobo's Lullabye

by Davis Eagle

Mose Scarlett is the third most skinny guy I've ever seen. Numbers one and two were a pair of identical twins who used to pretend that they didn't have any cheeks; they'd hang around the Coderich Restaurant and drink strawberry milkshakes for a laugh. They were great but there is no way that they could hold one's attention for more than a couple of rounds. Mose Scarlett is a different story (actually many different stories if the ease with which his anecdotes came to him is anything to go by); his music and personality stay with you to the extent that you forget to wonder how his spare frame manages to produce the deep, resonant sound that it does.

If one tried to categorize the music Scarlett plays, the closest attempt would be highly inadequate as his songs ranged from an Irving Berlin tune circa 1907, namely "Walkin' Stick" to Jimmy Rodgers' "In the Jailhouse Now," to his own contemporary songs. This diversity would seem to suggest a rather fragmented performance overall, but this was not the case as his dry humour and syncopated bounce guitar work effected a curious but pleasant old-time atmosphere.

Scarlett maintained this mood on the night (Saturday) that I reviewed by virtue of his approach to the rigours of performing which could be termed "laid-down" rather than "laid-back", proving Lanny McDonald does that a wrist shot is as effective as the big slapper. Scarlett combined his easiness with a couple of plaintive singalongs which capped the evening and left one feeling good. What more could you ask for?

Providing the perfect foil to Scarlett's long and lean approach was Norm Hacking, a Toronto boy who also bills himself as a travelling lion safari. Hacking, an 'endo' on the 'morph' scale plays a straight ahead brand of guitar which belies a sense of lyric which could be called tender if one had time to consider it. The problem is that his wit tends to assert itself to the degree that one remembers only the humorous side of him. Hacking played a most entertaining guest set, perhaps the best guest set of the year, so that there is a chance that he'll be back at Scarecrow in the new season starting in January.

There are only two more performers left to play before the Christmas break so if you haven't been down to Scarecrow yet this year, the next two weeks should provide a terrific introduction to the joy of folk music with David Bradstreet and Frank Wheeler filling the respective bills.

Les Grands Ballets Canadiens

This innovative Company is on its toes

by Louann Rutledge

Canadian ballet is top rate. Our dancers are powerful, polished and internationally acclaimed. One of the top three Canadian companies, Les Grands Ballets Canadiens, will present a varied program of dance Monday and Tuesday, Nov. 28 and 29 at the Grand Theatre. It shouldn't be missed.

Dance is a demanding performing art in that a dancer must be in complete control of his body, simultaneously projecting feelings to the audience and other dance characters onstage.

Dance schools in Canada produce a tremendous number of dancers each year. The majority of the students take dance for recreation, a few actively pursue their dance studies. Summer vacations are spent at York University, in Montreal or at the Banff School of Fine Arts, and the students thrive on the criticisms of the dance masters. If they are good enough, they might be accepted at an affiliate school of a professional company.

Further auditions separate near perfect dancers from the very good. Canadian dance companies are composed of only the very best dancers.

Choreographers, dance masters and artistic directors are vitally important to a dance company.

Brian Macdonald is the artistic director of Les Grands Ballets Canadiens. His works have appeared in the repertoire of notable international companies including the National Ballets of Israel and Cuba. He was awarded the Gold Star for Choreography at the Paris International Dance Festival in 1967, and the Order of Canada in 1967. Macdonald was a history major at McGill, then joined the Montreal Herald as music critic, and subsequently joined the National Ballet of Canada where he was one of only a few Canadian dancers. His stage career was ended by a severe injury, which led him to the field of choreography.

An aura of intellect surrounds Macdonald. Some of his ballets are done to words instead of music. He knows what he wants and believes that his dancers leave the audience with his own interpretations. He really believes that audiences can respond to abstracts in dance, and realizes that a ballet company, like any other business, must please the audience in order to survive. The price for staging a performance is phenomenal. A ballet company must pay for wages, transportation and accommodation for the dancers, dance masters, stage crew and administration. Only the best companies survive financially and financial resources can't be wasted.

On mediocre material. The ballets that are performed are of the best quality that a company can produce.

Monday and Tuesday's program will feature four short ballets of diversified natures. The dances are, the famous Swan Lake, Act II, Time Out of Mind, Lines and Points and Concerto Barocca.

Choreographed by Brian Macdonald, Lines and Points is a double "Pas de deux" danced to a poem. The ballet presents a visual pattern of lines, curves and spirals all on a rectangular theme. Lines and Points, along with Concerto Barocca is presented for the audience's visual enjoyment. The music of Concerto Barocca is by Bach, and each voice of the music is interpreted by a line of the dance. The third presentation, Time Out of Mind, was described by Brian Macdonald as "a sexy white ballet," and was one of the dances performed by the National Ballet of Cuba during Prime Minister Trudeau's recent tour there. Swan Lake, Act II, music by Tchaikovsky, first presented in 1877 completes the evening's performance.

The Swan Lake, Act II is frequently performed alone, and is in fact complete in itself. Prince Siegfried, hunting swans and is just about to shoot when the swans are transformed into beautiful young women. Odette, the Queen of the Swans, approaches Siegfried to tell him that they are under a spell cast by Rothbart the Magician. He has turned them into swans and they only have human form at night. Only love can break Rothbart's spell. The Prince is fascinated by Odette's great beauty and he falls in love with her.

Dancers are human and it is painful to work hard for years just to dance to a halt tilted auditorium of cold, unresponsive people. Les Grands Ballets Canadiens has received hearty receptions from foreign audiences. Let's not stifle our enthusiasm for their talent.

Modern sculpture expert to lecture at Art Centre

Modern British Sculpture: 1900 to the present will be the topic of an illustrated lecture by Dennis Farr, Director, City Museum and Art Gallery, Birmingham, England on Monday, Nov. 29, 1976 at 8:00 p.m. at the Agnes Etherington Art Centre.

Mr. Farr's career is international in scope. He was awarded his B.A. and M.A. in Fine Art at the Courtauld Institute of Art in London. Since that time he has had titles of Curator of the Paul Mellon Collection in Washington, D.C. and Assistant Keeper at the Tate Gallery in London. From 1967-69 he was senior lecturer in Fine Art and Deputy Keeper of the University Art Collection at the University of Glasgow.

Mr. Farr is an expert on the subject of modern and contemporary British sculpture. In 1969 he shared the responsibility for the Tate gallery's Catalogue of the Modern British School Collection and in 1965 published British Sculpture Since 1945. His articles have appeared in such art periodicals as Apollo and Burlington Magazine.

In the light of Sculptural activity in Kingston in recent months, Mr. Dennis Farr's visit to Agnes Etherington Art Centre is a timely one. His lecture also coincides with the Art Centre's current exhibition of the Sculpture of Saskatchewan artist, Douglas Benthall.

Mr. Farr's visit is presented under the auspices of the Agnes Etherington Art Centre and the Department of Art at Queen's University. There is no admission charge.

Cheers!

Gaels Wrestlers fourth at RMC, Muller wins

Football convert battles to victory

by Alex Faseruk

On Saturday, November 20, the Queen's Golden Grapplers made their season's debut at the R.M.C. Open. This tournament, which attracted 100 wrestlers from 10 teams, witnessed a high calibre of competition right up until the champions in the twelve weight classes were eventually declared.

Throughout the day the Gaels wrestled well by placing five men within the top four places of their respective weight classes and by finishing in fourth place in the unofficial team standings. Only York University, the Etobicoke Wrestling Club and Smith's Falls Wrestling Club managed to top the Gaels.

Individually Jim Muller proved to be the outstanding Gael of the day as he battled his way to first place in the 220 lbs. weight class and emerged to be Queen's only first place effort. Muller, a freshman, has only been practising with the team for a week. He is, however, still in great shape since Muller is an all-around athlete and has just finished his football season with the Golden Gaels Football squad Muller, who finished fifth in the Ontario High School Championship last year should be able to put together a good season and fare well at the O.U.A.A. Championships.

The 142 pound weight class proved to be the most successful for the Golden Grapplers as they managed second, third and fourth place finishes in this class which had fourteen competitors.

A second place finish was earned by Mike Moggridge who in the championship match Moggridge actually tied the champion McCrun from Smith's Falls 6-6. However, in wrestling there can no longer be a tie in a match. McCrun was awarded the victory since he had acquired a 3 point near fall move whereas Moggridge, the more consistent scorer in the match, managed only moves of two and one technical points. Consequently, Moggridge lost the match, although he was the more consistent and aggressive of the two opponents.

Veteran Ron "Crash" Craddock wrestled exceptionally well on his way to the finals in the 142 lb. weight class, where he eventually ended up with a third place finish. "Crash" pinned 3 opponents and was awarded a 4 point move in the preliminary rounds. A four point move is awarded very rarely in wrestling. To gain 4 points on a hold, the wrestler must throw his opponent a great height and hold him on the ground in the danger position (near fall) for 5 seconds. Craddock's 4 point move proved to be the only one awarded in the competition.

Chris Thomas, who managed a fourth place finish in the 142 lb. class, also wrestled quite well. In the preliminary rounds he defeated two of his opponents by pins. Thomas was, however, withdrawn from the competition when he injured his hand against McCrun the eventual champion from Smith's Falls and had to settle with a fourth place finish.

Crash Craddock grapples to victory at R.M.C. tournament

Rookie John Voors also had a good tourney as he finished second out of twelve competitors in the 150 lb class. Voors started the day slowly as he lost his first match but was able to bounce back, pin two opponents and go on to a second place finish.

In all, nine wrestlers competed for the Gaels and seven were able to place within the top 4. Hopefully, those who did not place will have at least benefitted from the experience and will be able to improve as the season goes on.

Next weekend, the Golden Grapplers will continue the season as they travel to Toronto for the Ryerson Open on Saturday, November 27. This will be the fifth annual Ryerson Open. In the past it has proven to be an extremely tough competition drawing top wrestlers from Michigan and New York as well as Ontario. With a few breaks, the Golden Grapplers could provide a few pleasant surprises and carry some hardware home from the tournament.

Roy Worthington will be making his season's debut as he has chosen to compete in this generally tough tournament. Hopefully, Coach Worthington will be able to add the title of the Ryerson Open to his already impressive set of laurels.

College Bowl

by Tom Shand

The University of Western Ontario Mustangs won their third college Bowl in the event's twelve year history on Friday night with a 29-13 victory over the Acadia Axemen at Varsity Stadium.

The favoured Mustangs were forced to come from behind as Acadia led 13-7 at half-time. The Axemen's first-half performance can be attributed to the fine passing combination of Bob Cameron to Bob Stracina, both all Canadians. Stracina caught 10 passes for 189 yards in the first half but was held to 2 catches for 33 yards in the final half. Stracina's performance set a College Bowl record as did Acadia's 312 total passing yards.

Rick Haswell and Tony Fallis scored two touchdowns each to lead the Mustangs in the scoring department. All Canadian Bill Rozalowsky picked 104 yards on 17 carries to lead all rushers.

A note which might hold special interest for Queen's fans is that the goalposts at Varsity Stadium came down twice, courtesy of the exuberant Mustang fans. The Mustang supporters, who comprised most of the 20,342 in attendance, removed the posts at halftime then constructed the temporary set that they had brought with them from Western which they also tore down with 1:05 left to play.

Hockey Gals disappointed

by Susan Creighton

The Hockey Gals played a pair of home games this weekend in confrontations with York and McMaster universities. The first game, where Queen's clobbered York 7-1, was quite a sluggish game on the part of the Gals. Despite a goal by Carol (Quintz) Petty (and one by York) in the first period, Queen's was not sparked into action until the second period when Sue Thompson notched one of her four goals for the evening. Janean (Big G) Gerow scored shortly afterwards and then again in the last period when the remaining four goals were scored. This, the third victory of the season, was quite similar to the other games where Queen's has come on strong as a third period team.

Saturday's game against McMaster was the toughest game yet for the Gals. Finally matched against a team of equal strength, Queen's was forced into playing a rugged, tiring game. With the score tied 1-1 at the end of the second period, both teams emerged in the third battling harder than ever for the position of first place in the league's standings. Queen's came across with a beautiful goal by Anne (Pepsi) Symes in the third period which was matched shortly afterwards by McMaster. With only about six minutes remaining in the game, McMaster scored on a fluke shot to notch the winning goal of the game. This was Queen's first loss, and with a final score of 3-2, everyone was quite disappointed. (Author's note: One of McMaster's best players, Lois Cole, was sitting out this game due to injury incurred in the York Invitational Tournament at the beginning of this month.)

Queen's will face another tough team, University of Toronto, next weekend at the Jock Hartly Arena. This is the Gal's last game before their "Christmas Break", and they would appreciate a large turnout of supporters. (The support of all those who turned out for this weekend's games was greatly appreciated.)

Queen's Gals "Big G" Janean Gerow powers past sprawling defender

Blues in championship form

by Tom Shand

Word had it that the Varsity Blues were a mere image of their teams of past years primarily because they lacked scoring punch. This rumour certainly received little vindication this past weekend as the Blues outscored the Golden Gaels 6-3 and 10-1.

Gaels held their own for two periods on Friday night and after that it was "game over". Queen's appeared to be capable of playing with the Blues until they made the fatal mistake of falling behind. Playing catch up hockey against Toronto is much like trying to jump back on a tightrope after you've fallen off.

John MacIntyre, and Terry Angel gave the Gaels two, one goal advantages over the first two periods, and Willie Wing notched the lone catch-up goal. The first lead lasted for only 34 seconds as Doug Caines took advantage of the Gaels brief post-goal lapse to score his first of four goals. Blues two second period goals came as a result of Queen's penalties. Alex Jeans banked a shot off the post past Andy Schell five seconds after Dale Sandle's interference penalty had elapsed. Caines hit again for the Blues with Brian Harrington off for crosschecking.

In the final period it was all Blues as Doug Caines added two more and his linemate Larry Hopkins closed out the scoring at six. All the Blues scoring came from their triumvirate of Caines, Jeans and Hopkins. Needless to say they were very sharp both in their passing, and shooting. Caines counted 94 points last season with the St. Catherine Black Hawks of the OHA and was drafted in the fifth round of the NHL draft by the New York Rangers. Jeans played last season with the Oshawa Generals.

With Ruhnke, Precious, Fifeild,

and Wise all gone the Blues lost their top four scorers from last year, however, the new faces certainly did not look out of place in filling their shoes as the Blues still come at you for a solid 60 minutes.

The outcome of Saturday's match at lock Harty was never in question as the Blues led 5-0 after the first period, 7-1 after two and came out with a resounding 10-1 victory.

Captain Ron Harris and defenceman Warren Anderson both notched a pair with singles going to Rooke, Jeans, Adoranti, Snetsinger, Wagner and Davis. Earl Moulton scored the Gaels' lone effort on a long slap shot which Varsity goaltender Mark Logan mishandled.

Gaels were outshot only 42-25 but had few good scoring chances. Andy Schell did not have one of his finer games in net for Queens' but then again there were very few who did look good for the Gaels who appeared to be weary of heart and leg.

Gaels played Saturday minus captain Frank Coffee, who pulled a muscle in his back on Friday, while Doug Caines did not dress for Varsity. Warren Anderson, two time All-Canadian, was undoubtedly the outstanding player on the ice from his defence position. He and veteran defenceman Al Milne both have returned to the Blues for their fifth year after a year's absence in order that they can accompany the team on their three week trip to Japan and China in December.

Notes: Blues have two good goalies in Mark Logan and Ken MacKenzie. Based on Friday's showing my nod would go to MacKenzie who was all Ivy League in two years at Yale.

Gaels have ten days to recuperate and to think about last weekend. On November 30, they play Ottawa in Ottawa. Next home games are Dec. 3rd and 4th against York.

Alex Jeans puts home shot for the Blues in a 6-3 Varsity victory.

Women's Fencing Team fares well

The Queen's Women's Fencing team fared well in an invitational tournament held at Queen's this past Saturday. The girl's first team, comprised of Rosemary Knight, Marian Niamer and Mary Jane Henderson finished second in the five team tournament.

The double elimination tournament was held in the Queen's Dance Studio. The Gaels entered two teams who hosted squads from McGill, York and Toronto. The Gaels second team was made of Mary Jane Baldwin, Vivian Kopchan and Sharon Mitchem.

As was the case in most events involving University of Toronto athletes this weekend, the Toronto girls were undefeated and consequently won the tournament. Gaels first team won all but their match against the Varsity who all took home gold medallions.

Trent was the surprise of the tourney as they entered at the last moment and despite losing their first match still finished third. Special thanks should be given to the volunteer timers and scorers who did an excellent job.

Golden Gals go to Mac Invitational

Teams sent a small but select group to Hamilton for their first away trip this year. The McMaster Invitational was a good chance to see the other teams in action and gain meet experience.

The divers, led by Janet Nutter who came first on both boards, were Sandra McDaniels who came 11th on the 1 metre and Eve Wahn who came 4th on the 3 metre board.

Swimmers Carol Kennedy, Diana Harrison, Bev Webb, Jennifer Hietala and Paula Rodgers showed their potential versatility by entering the maximum number of events plus the free and medley relays. This meet was good experience and the times and placings earned Saturday should enable Queen's to place well up in the OWIAA final standings.

Mental errors key to loss

Max Smart (24) follows rule "You may look but do not touch".

by Brian Clarke

It's beginning to look more and more like the Queen's University Golden Gaels men's basketball team won't be a winning one this year.

Friday night, the Gaels were defeated 78-66 by the University of Toronto Blues in Queen's Bartlett Gym for their third Ontario University Athletic Association Basketball League loss. Queen's has one victory over Ryerson Polytechnical Institute Rams.

This isn't to say that the Gaels didn't provide the fans with any good basketball play during their defeat to the Blues. The lead in the game changed hands eight times in the first half, before ending in a 35-35 halftime score.

But in the second half Toronto took control of the lead as Queen's found itself stymied by its own oftensive and defensive errors. After hitting on 50 percent of their shots in the first half the Gaels slumped to 39 in the second, while the Blues moved up from 39 to 41.

"Mental errors, that's what hurt us the most," said Queen's coach Pete Smith. "The players don't have the poise yet which can only come with experience."

"This team isn't my team yet," added coach Smith. "It takes time to get players to change their old habits. Last year these guys didn't spend too much time scrimmaging and I feel that's really important. Maybe two years from now I'll have a team here that will be truly my own."

Just two Gaels, Henry Garbaty and Derek Swinnard scored in the double figures. Garbaty netted 21 points, while Swinnard had 18.

Doug Fox led the Blues scoring with 29 points, while Randy Cook got 14, and Walter Kucharczyk made 11.

The last time the Gaels had the lead was with about ten minutes remaining in the game. After building up a 55-50 lead, Queen's watched it evaporate as Toronto hustled to tie the score at 59-59 and then took over the lead for the rest of the game.

After the loss Coach Smith understandably wasn't very pleased with his Gaels but he did single out Henry Garbaty for special praise. "I think he shot quite well," said coach Smith. Garbaty was also the Gaels' top rebounder.

It was again what was not (until the last five minutes when the Blues opened up a seven-point lead) out of the Gaels' grasp from winning, and that's what made defeat all the more disappointing.

Both teams respected the importance of a win. "It was one game we decided we had to have," said

Blue Rick Hollowell. "A loss against Queen's wouldn't help our playoff chances."

The way the OUA is shaping up this year it looks like it could be a tight between teams like Toronto and Queen's for a final playoff berth.

"We aren't overestimating our abilities," said Toronto Coach John McManis. "I think we'll be lucky to make the playoffs."

Coach Smith gives roughly the same picture of the position of his Gaels. When the season started, he said then, "our long-range goal is to make the playoffs - just to make them."

In exhibition action Saturday, the Gaels commuted to Potsdam, New York where they were defeated 98-71 by Potsdam State University College.

At halftime, Queen's was behind just 41-38, but in the second half Potsdam controlled the play.

Lorenz Paulsen was Queen's top scorer with 19 points, while Derek Swinnard got 11. Both players got nine rebounds.

Queen's is now idle until the weekend when they travel to Waterloo to play two games, one on Saturday and another Sunday, against the Athenas.

WIC-ly News

by Carolyn Corrigan

It's now time to begin the slow process of making room for all of those Christmas yummies that will soon be gobbled up.

WIC hereby invites all girls to come and win points for yourself and your faculty or residence by jogging laps. The WIC Jogathon will continue until November 30th, so grab a friend and forget those essays, assignments and mid-terms for an hour. A daily sign-up sheet will be kept beside the track on which you can record all completed laps. Come anytime the track is open. Let's get moving.

WIC Skatathon is also a good means to obtain points. Get a little fresh air and exercise while meeting a lot of new and interesting people. Everyone is welcome Wednesday night 7:00 until 8:20. All you need is a minimum of 30 laps to count.

The Broomball final standings are: Science and Arts '80 tied for first place, P.H.E. in 2nd place, Rehab in 3rd and Education in 4th place (N.B. Nursing defaulted all of their games). A special thanks is extended to all of the captains.

Finally, a special invitation is hereby extended to all WIC sticks, convokers and executive to attend a very important (short) meeting Thursday, November 30th, at 6:00 p.m. in Seminar "A".

Rugby Club conquers all

by Ruds

This year's rugby season looked as if it would end on a disappointing note, as both the first, then the second XV's discovered they would not be returning to the OUA championships. For the second XV in particular, it was a disheartening conclusion to a season that saw them win 7 out of 8 starts. The second's chance for a 6th league title in 7 years was snuffed out by a last minute rule interpretation.

The Gaels resumed their winning ways, however, by sweeping the OUA sevens tournament, the Gaels hockey team and the Suzie-Q talent night, all within 3 days.

In the ice and snow at Waterloo, the Gaels left little doubt that the winning touch was still there; dispatching Guelph 12-4, trouncing RMC 24-0 and shutting out Waterloo in the final, 18-0. Outstanding for Queen's was Alun Williams who played heady rugby all day; and Dave Morgan of Guelph, who we promised to mention in the Journal.

Rugby being only a sideline for our talented boys, they moved on to the Jock Harty Ice Palace to meet the vaunted Golden Gaels. Bruising hitting and several brawls highlighted the encounter - the good guys emerging with the laurels by a score of 5 to 4. The outstanding players were the Gaels' goalie Ms. Diana Loucks who plays as if she's been dipping into the hormones, and John "the Rocket" Howie who set back the cause of Scottish Independence by about 100 years.

Having triumphed at what we do woi - the club retired to the pub for a session of what we do best. Sometime during the evening, the crowd was treated to a medley of music both pure and sweet. In a no contest affair, the Queen's Rugby Club vocal ensemble was voted "Best

New Talent" and "Most Likely to Succeed", and were promptly stormed by dozens of nubile young Suzie-Q's.

Tomorrow night - being Wed 24th - all Rugby Club members are reminded of the importance of the Annual General Meeting. On the agenda will be the election of next year's captain and vice captain, and a progress report on our proposed Spring tour. Everyone's presence is vital.

PQ in on Thursday

Rene Levesque will become premier of Quebec next Thursday, and will name his cabinet the next day. The announcement came after a Thursday afternoon meeting between Premier Robert Bourassa and Mr. Levesque.

Mr. Bourassa announced that he was resigning from the leadership of the Liberal party January 1. The report said Mr. Bourassa will accept a position with a "world organization in Europe."

Curbs on wiretaps

Ontario Attorney-General Roy McMurtry announced changes in wiretap legislation designed to restrict the power of police to wiretap lawyer-client conversations. Mr. McMurtry said that under the new legislation lawyer-client conversations could not be monitored except in extremely rare circumstances. At present, a blanket authorization covers the tapping of lawyer-client conversations.

The announcement came after a wild session in the Ontario legislature in which a Liberal MPP was ejected. The furor developed after Mr. MacBeth revealed that a wiretap of Donald Turner (who was found guilty on November 4 of the murder of Steven Clover), and his lawyer, was carried out by the provincial police with proper authorization.

About 41.7 percent of the 23,000 working agreements referred to the Anti-Inflation Board in the 53 week period ending October 22 were above federal guidelines.

The agreements above federal guidelines provided for an average first year increase of 12.3 percent, 3.1 percent higher than the controls permit. The remaining agreements averaged 1.2 percent under the allowed levels. Proposed increases in the public sector averaged 15.4 percent, while the board suggested an average raise of 12 percent. In the private sector the figures were 13.1 percent and 11.3 percent respectively.

Patty Hearst freed

Patty Hearst was released from jail to the custody of her parents last Friday on $15-million bail. She had been behind bars since September, 1975. Patty is presently awaiting an appeal on her conviction of bank robbery, as well as a trial in Los Angeles for state charges of robbery and kidnapping.

Randolph Hearst, Patty's father, deposited $100,000 in cash, ten percent of the federal bail of one million dollars, as well as a $500,000 bond to guarantee Patty's appearance at her trial in Los Angeles.

China explodes bomb

China described its latest nuclear test as a complete success, and pointed to it as an example of the country's new leaders' intention to modernize its armed forces. Analysts said the wording of the announcement of the blast reflected increased army influence within the post-Mao leadership. One expert said it was of great long-term significance that Chairman Hua Kuo-Feng's first publicized instruction should be related to modernization, production and scientific research.

Teenage alcoholism

Dr. Wolfgang Schmidt charged the Ontario government with having "no intention" of acting on a recent drinking study that demands strict restrictions on alcohol access to underage drinkers. The recommendations in the report range from raising the drinking age to 19 to issuing identity cards to all people under 25 years of age.

The report was prepared by Conservative MPP Terry Jones. He is disappointed that the heaviest emphasis has been placed on his age recommendations. Ontario Attorney-General Roy McMurtry denied the report had been shoved aside, adding that it was difficult to get a consensus within the Cabinet because

Russ Jackson was fired as head coach of the Toronto Argonauts last week after two years with that team. The team had finished in last place both years. The remaining three years of Jackson's contract with the Argos will be honoured (at about $65,000 a year). The owners are still undecided about whether or not to retain the present assistant coaches.

More quakes

Another earthquake hit the Peking area of China a week ago. The tremor was not felt as strongly as the more violent quakes (8.2 on the Richter scale) that hit the city at the end of July. The epicentre of the more recent quake was located in the Tangshan area, about 100 miles east-northeast of Peking. The aftershock of the quake registered 7.9 on the Richter scale, while the quake itself was about 6.7.

There were no reports of significant property damage or injury.

Mayoralty candidates air views & platforms

by Maben Smith

At a mayoralty candidate session last Wednesday night in Stirling Hall, four candidates provided students with some insight into their various campaigns, and outlined the steps they would take in office, given an electoral victory this December 6. There were approximately thirty students attending.

Ken Keyes spoke first, criticizing a Journal editorial (Friday, November 19) which he said suggested that students should remain outside the municipal elections. He felt students must take the time and effort necessary to examine this election so that they do make an input into the city's affairs. In discussing his program for City Hall, he outlined four key issues that he was interested in furthering. Mr. Keyes would promote the tourist industry to its fullest; he feels it is the City's prime resource. He stated the City must promote its attractions in the same vigorous way as the Province promotes Fort Henry.

Secondly, he feels confident enough about the importance of the downtown area to state his preference for its growth versus that of the surrounding Kingston vicinity. Keyes stated emphatically that Kingston is not an industrial city, and that the role of the present industrial commissioner must be changed to reflect this. His third point dealt with the historic nature of the city and the need to give appropriate recognition to this. He spoke also of the importance of developing Kingston's waterfront area.

Kit Spence, a fourth year political studies student at Queen's, criticized present and past City governments for neglecting a solid developmental scheme that was of utmost importance in planning for the future of the City. He outlined the need for new, clean and soft industry in the city that should both serve to bolster the economy and cut unemployment. Such development, he continued, should be attracted by committing municipal funds for that purpose. He would also like to see a reduction of the severe crime rate that presently affects the downtown core of the City. This, according to Spence, has a great deal to do with welfare opportunities that are provided. In its place, he would see the monies transferred into other social services.

Spence talked of day care centres, garbage collection, schooling, heritage responsibilities, housing standards, transportation systems, parking, as well as the need to end conflict between the employed and unemployed, the old and the young, the students and non-students, and the core and suburban sectors.

The third candidate to address the audience was Paul Guindon. He said his concern was solely with crime in the city, especially that which involved women. He felt neither City Hall nor the police were paying sufficient attention to it. He feels that society is continually being corrupted by such things as Satanism, nazism, and homosexuality. Guindon's discussion elaborated on a number of unusual characteristics of life today. This included graveyards, shampoos, reincarnation, the Whig-Standard, cable TV and the Y M C A.

The final candidate to speak was Edward Phipps-Walker. After a long and detailed account of his eventful past, he told his audience that he was strictly apolitical, and his term in office would be more public relations oriented than anything else.

Students report robberies, rape around Queen's

by Chris Chenoweth

A recent series of breakings and entries in the student ghetto has resulted in 4 reported robberies and one case of attempted rape within the last two weeks. The most recent crime occurred Monday night when four Kingstonians, reportedly high-school students, broke into 265 Earl St. and made off with $500 worth of stereo albums. One resident, David Mazzei, was asleep at the time of the theft, but was awakened by the noise and managed to prevent any further robbery. However, the four thieves managed to get away with the albums. In a recent development on Wednesday night, the Book Bin reported receiving one-half of the stolen property. A description of the four youths, (one girl and three teenagers), has been issued. Police are now investigating and an early arrest is expected.

This series of crimes in the student area began with the attempted rape of a Queen's student in her own home at midnight two weeks ago. The woman screamed loudly during the confrontation and the rapist was scared off. Violence continued last week with the smashing of a student's doorway on Earl St. by three Queen's students who used a concrete block to accomplish their drunken project. Since then, $90 was stolen from a residence at 370 Barrie St. by an unknown burglar, and in a separate incident, a theft occurred at 248 University St. on Saturday morning.

Teachers attack, Norman defends study

by Jon Young

Professor Colin Norman drew a mixture of criticism and some praise for his controversial book The Queen's English from a panel of teachers and university professors at a seminar held at McArthur on Wednesday afternoon. Outlining some of the major findings of his study, which attempted to measure standards of literacy among Undergraduates in the faculty of Arts and Science at Queen's, Professor Norman stated that some 34 percent of first year students write either poorly or badly, and that these figures appear to be in line with a "fairly clear picture" that is emerging from other studies carried out at other Canadian Universities. Recent figures have quoted the percentages of students whose literacy was "less than adequate" as 45 percent at Waterloo, 55 percent at Guelph, and 40 percent at the University of British Columbia.

The study was attacked by Professor Peter Watson of the Faculty of Education at Queen's on a number of grounds. He questioned the definition of literacy used in the study and criticized the use of students' exam papers for the study without the students' knowledge or consent. He also doubted the validity of findings based on student writing under exam conditions, when many students had been advised to write in note form as their answers would be marked on their content value.

While there was no general agreement among the panel as to whether or not standards of literacy had declined in the last decade, (although Professor Norman, with tongue in cheek, suggested that a comparison of the Queens Journal and arduous task beginning at the over the years might suggest that elementary level

The oil man cometh

Premier Peter Lougheed of Alberta will speak at Queen's, Monday, Nov. 29, 8 p.m. at Dunning Hall. The Premier will be speaking, not on oil, but on the role of the federal-provincial relations and repatriation of the Canadian Constitution. In addition to his speech, the Premier will appear at certain business courses throughout the day.

Construction

Mayor George Speal hinted last Wednesday at a possible agreement between Kingston and a developer who would like to construct an apartment building along Little Cataraqui Creek south of Princess Street. The city would like to have this area along the creek preserved as a green belt, and wants to wait for the Cataraqui Region Conservation Authority to finish a study on possible uses of this land before making any decisions.

Mississauga Apartments Ltd., the company in question, took the problem to court in Ottawa when Kingston would not issue a building permit they had been waiting for, for more than a year. The divisional court judge in Ottawa ordered the city to issue the necessary permit, and meetings are now taking place in an attempt to sort out these difficulties.

Second fire

A second fire in two days broke out here last Thursday. The Gordon Tompkins Funeral Home and an adjacent house were burnt out and both will have to be demolished. Arson has been considered, and the explosion which was heard immediately before the fire started supports this suspicion.

The fire spread amazingly quickly, but no one was injured in it. Two elderly ladies were rescued in a rather dramatic fashion by firefighters. Alice Conner and Ethel Shillington were taken out of their second floor apartment through a tiny back window. They are now in hospital being treated for smoke inhalation. One casket was saved from the funeral home.

Festival

A proposal has been made to hold a "Festival Month" in Kingston every summer featuring various national and international sailing competitions and events. The idea is supported by the success of the cultural events held during the Olympics and the Tercentenary celebrations. An additional boost was given when the finance committee voted to reserve a $20,000 surplus from the Kingston Olympic Public Events Committee budget for a fund to be used to hold such a festival. If the 1977 council does not approve this project, the money will be channelled back into the city's general budget.

Bath Road

The Bath Road problem is a much-discussed issue in Kingston at the moment. The problem results from almost permanent congestion, 24,000 vehicles enter the city every day over this road, and the total number of vehicles using Bath Road as a route into or out of the city is fifty percent greater than those using Princess or Division Streets for the same purpose. At the intersection of Bath Road and Portsmouth Avenue statistics reveal a total of thirty-one accidents for last year, the greatest number recorded at any one intersection in the city.

A new bridge is being built over Little Cataraqui Creek, and this should help alleviate the bottleneck at this point where the road now narrows down to two lanes. Traffic planners have proposed the creation of alternate routes, but any construction would be several years away.

Venezuelans

Twenty-five Venezuelans arrived here in Kingston three weeks ago to start an immersion course in English at St. Lawrence College. For one year they will concentrate on learning English. Then they will write the TOEFL (Test of English as a Foreign Language) and, if successful, they will then enrol in a Canadian university and work towards degrees in areas in which Venezuela lacks technical expertise.

Two hundred and fifty students were sent to Canada this fall under The Gran Mariscal de Ayacucho Scholarship Program financed by the government of Venezuela. All their costs are covered by their government, which hopes to acquire specialists who will make their permanent home in Venezuela and who will help the country develop its technical programs.

St. Lawrence College has arranged a special program of English instruction for these students, and would like to be able to provide homes in the Kingston community for the Venezuelans. More willing families are needed to provide these accommodations. The students range in age from 16 to 29 and four of them have families and children waiting for them in Venezuela.

On the whole the students are enthusiastic about their stay here and enjoy commenting on the snow and on the differences in attitude between Canadians and South Americans.

Odds and ends

Snorers are not to be laughed at: they have a serious problem which can be fatal. Heavy snorers who gasp can over-relax their upper throat and mouth tissues, and if this happens air to the lungs is cut off and instant death occurs.

Unjust compensation

That the Pub staff should be reviewed for an increase in wages this week helps to amplify a great discrepancy within the AMS organization.

For all our complaints about it, the AMS Executive does a remarkable job. Its two basic functions of representing students and administering services (such as the Pub) are well accomplished. Its efforts deserve better compensation than the few hundred dollars its members annually receive for their efforts expended throughout the school year.

For that matter, the hundred and twenty five dollars available to our senior editors at the Journal is a disgraceful difference of recognition for time spent when compared with the hourly salaries of the senior Pub staff.

The classic argument against giving salaries to AMS and Journal student workers involves the future compensation one can expect by having such credentials appear on one's resume when job seeking. But is the president of the AMS or the Editor of the Journal able to impress a potential employer with their credentials any more than the persons who run the Queen's Pub? That establishment's cash flow is well in excess of many businesses in this city; to be responsible for these funds and a large staff is no less demanding than the administration of student government or newspaper.

Yet the senior Pub staff members receive almost as much in two weeks as the Journal Editor receives for eight months work. The Pub manager takes home in four weeks almost as much as the AMS Vice Presidents make during the academic year.

The Journal Editor is required to clock roughly 50 hours per week. For this he receives less than eight dollars. The assistant Pub manager receives ten times this amount for roughly half as many hours.

Why does this situation exist? Why do we not recognize equal pay for equal work? The AMS should stop this basically unjust system of compensation. Either the Pub staff and, we might add, the constable staff, should work for the same token amount or, logically the AMS Executive and Journal staff should receive salaries.

Standards enforced

We would completely endorse a recommendation from the Arts & Science Faculty Board to reintroduce the use of admission tests. To ensure a basic competence in mathematics and writing skills in high school graduates is only common sense. It would be an indication that universities are determined to maintain high standards of education even if the price might be a smaller enrollment and thus a smaller provincial subsidy.

The standards of education cannot be allowed to drop at either the secondary or post secondary level. We are blessed with the ability to educate thousands of people in this province. Unfortunately, as Saturday Night magazine put it, we have lost a good deal of the education from mass education. By introducing entrance examinations, the universities would be forcing the high schools to produce students of a calibre necessary to maintain a reputation for educated graduates.

The responsible vote

The Journal wishes to elaborate on the position taken in last Friday's editorial "The Responsible Vote". We encourage responsible participation in the electoral process. The maintenance of a healthy municipality depends upon awareness and interest on the part of the electorate. Therefore we feel that students who are not natives of Kingston should not be blindly encouraged to vote locally when, in fact, the best interests of all concerned might better be served if some students voted by proxy in their home community. We would merely suggest that voting be a responsible exercise.

Debating win:
"Queen Bees"
sting U of T

by Dick Woodside

Queen's came first out of 25 Canadian and American universities at the Twenty-Second Adlai Stevenson Princeton Debate Tournament. A record 52 teams competed including Queen's.

Nine Canadian universities were represented: Queen's, Concordia, College Militaire Royale, Loyola, McGill, Osgoode, RMC, Victoria College of U. of T. and U. of T. Included among the American universities were Columbia, Princeton, Vassar and Yale.

The first Queen's team consisted of Keith Jarvi (2nd year Math) and Neil Swezey (1st year Meds). The second team, the "Queen Bees" was comprised of David Corbett (1st year Arts) and Graham Sellers (3rd year History).

The Corbett-Sellers team won the final round against U. of T., the topic being "only the educated are free", by judges' verdict of 5 to 2.

"You should commit yourselves, feel guilty...feel unhappy..." urged Ms. M. E. Meyer in a lecture she delivered last Tuesday night in the fourth lecture of the Last Lecture Series.

Pursuing the question of Freedom and Choice, Ms. Meyer, Chairman of Undergraduate Studies in the Sociology department, familiarized the listeners with Sartre's contention that men are condemned to be free. Life is not programmed, so men must therefore make decisions and take responsibility for their consequences, said Ms. Meyer.

To make no choice is in fact a decision, and to claim one has not made a decision would be in bad faith. Ms. Meyer illustrated this point as she related a Second World War experience in which she and a group of others escaped Nazi repression by climbing the mountains from France over into Switzerland. Soon after crossing the border a Swiss patrol threatened to force the groups' return into France and possible death.

Happily, circumstances were such that this did not ensue, but Ms. Meyer reflected that the Swiss patrol could not have claimed to be merely following orders, but was effectively making a decision which could have resulted in the death of the group at the hands of the Nazis. Similarly, if the Swiss guard had turned a blind eye to the refugees, this would also have constituted a decision in which the responsibility for subsequent consequences would have had to be borne.

It is never possible, suggested the lecturer, to avoid blame for a decision by maintaining that one was simply following orders or that one hadn't thought of the consequences, for this would be dealing in bad faith. Ms. Meyer declared that since one cannot avoid decisions and commitments it was at least necessary to make them in good faith "through awareness and knowledge", in order to reach moral choices. "This is no recipe for happiness," she said, adding that even feeling guilty as a result of a poor decision was a step in the right direction.

In comparing the decisions her generation had to make and those which we must make today, Ms. Meyer deplored of the increasing tendency towards the erroneous belief in a purely "instrumental", "scientific" calculation of life's choices.

We are not always totally free because there are, in particular, social pressures which come to bear on us, Ms. Meyer said. As a result, although "Sartre tells us we are free and condemned to freedom, we are also human and condemned to being so," asserted the Sociology professor, implying that we must make responsible, aware, humane decisions.

Gastroenterologists give $1000

Grad student wins money

Miss Jo-ann Fox a graduate student in the Department of Physiology currently conducting research in the Queen's University Digestive Diseases Unit at the Hotel Dieu Hospital has won a $1,000 prize for her research. The Canadian Association of Gastroenterology has invited her to address its annual meeting in January 1977, at which time she will receive her prize.

Miss Fox originally trained as a nurse, has done all her graduate work in Physiology at Queen's University. Her research in the Queen's University Digestive Disease Unit with Dr. Beck has largely concerned the effect of alcohol ingestion on the intestinal tract.

statement showed a total income of $46,960 million, operating expenses of $47,833 million, and an operating deficit of $873,000.

'75 - '76 Principal's Report presented:

Watts emphasizes financial problems

by Maureen Wagner

Principal Watts discussed at some length the importance of government funding in a recent lecture following in the wake of National Student's Day.

An issue of particular concern, he said, is whether or not the federal government will continue to support universities. The present budget expires in 1977 and is now under negotiation between both the federal and provincial governments. At present, the federal budget represents 50 percent of the current costs of post secondary education across the country.

In an interview, Principal Watts expressed particular concern that the funding level be sufficient to maintain the quality of our universities rather than having these funds so spread out by expansion as to allow our quality to decline.

This fact can be proven by looking at the operating expenditures for 1975-76 particularly in the area of instruction.

"Queen's spent more than any other university in this area and the least on administration and physical plant."

Admission Policies:

University entrance has been a popular topic of discussion of late. Queen's was one of four universities which applied tests in English and Mathematics to incoming students.

Graduate Studies:

The Ontario government has imposed a two year freeze on funding for graduate studies. The situation puts the onus on each university to establish its priorities in areas of graduate programs.

Review of Enrollment:

As an issue of concern to all students at Queen's, Principal Watts confirmed that student enrollment has reached a steady level and that it is now a matter of consolidating the current level. He also stressed the university's need to remain financially viable at this level.

Library:

Queen's is now a recognized member of the five-member Canadian Association of Research Libraries. This is a fact of which to be proud, but does not alleviate the space problem in Douglas Library. A short run solution has been reached by the Senate Library Committee which is studying the possibilities of moving less-used books to storage areas.

QHA-QWC benefit reaches goal

A gay benefit dance was held last Saturday, November 20, in MacDonald Hall, co-sponsored by the Queen's Homophile Association and the Queen's Women's Center.

According to Mary Biehn of the QWC, the turnout of approximately 100 was good, and the evening was, on the whole, a success.

Approximately $185 of the money that was raised will be going towards the defence fund for John Damien, a homosexual who is suing his former employers for wrongful dismissal.

is that, as advocates of women's rights, they feel women have the right to be gay if they wish.

After refusing an offered bribe of $15,000 to quit his job, as a horse racing steward jockey, Damien was then fired because he was gay. A jury-decided court case is expected to be called soon, and if decided in favour of Damien, it will, according to John Damien of QHA, "set a precedent of value to the whole Anglo-American law system." At the moment Gays' rights are not protected by the Human Rights Bill.

People from outside of the Queen's community attended the dance or contributed to the cause out of sympathy for the Damien and child custody cases.

Commerce to publish business mag.

by Tim Greenwood

The Commerce Society is publishing a magazine this year tentatively titled Business Canada which will be oriented toward the concerns of the business world. Some Commerce undergraduates and MBA students are writing articles which will be edited and consolidated over the Christmas break by the editorial staff of faculty and students.

The Commerce Society constitution states that the society should put out a magazine once a year, but this year's magazine marks the first effort since Commerce Man of two years ago. The articles will focus on business matters being examined by the Queen's community that are relevant to the country at large, and an article by Premier Lougheed of Alberta will be included. When the magazine comes off the presses in March of '77, it will be provided to Canadian businesses, Alumni of the school of business, as well as being available on campus.

LONDON ONT. [CUP]—The students' union at the University of Western Ontario has taken the first step towards a new provincial student organization to replace the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS).

The University Students' Council (USC) voted Nov. 10 to call a meeting of university and college student council presidents to discuss the proposed organization sometime in the new year.

The move was proposed by USC Board of Directors member Steve Lichty, who was instrumental in the successful campaign to pull Western out of OFS during a recent campus referendum on OFS membership.

USC vice-president Greg Kay, an OFS supporter during the referendum Oct. 25-27, asked Lichty if he didn't think the proposed meeting was "a little premature at this point."

But Lichty refused a suggestion the conference be delayed until the opinion of other campuses was sought saying, "If they don't want representation (in the new organization), they won't show up."

Western students voted narrowly to cease their membership in the four-year old OFS in the recent referendum called by the USC last spring after some councillors objected to a then-recent leaflet on provincial government cutbacks in social services.

USC executive member Larry Haskell recommended the council urge students to vote against continued OFS membership in an article for the provincial Young Progressive Conservatives' newsletter after he attended the OFS spring conference last June.

Lichty, an executive member of the PC's Campus Association council, led the anti-OFS campaign which focussed mainly on the federation's unionized staff's wages and benefits.

The USC's proposed new organization would concentrate on tuition fees and stipends for occupational therapy students, both long-standing OFS demands.

The council decided to pay for the cost of the conference, but will ask participating student unions to pay their own travel to the UWO campus.

Laurentian senate rejects differential fees

SUDBURY [CUP]—The Laurentian University Senate voted 14 to 11 to reject a motion aimed at tripling tuition fees for visa students entering graduate programs this coming January. International Students Organization President Chris Studholme stated the difference "...will save Ontario taxpayers less than $1... only Alberta and Ireland have differential fees."

Studholme further pointed out that "...international students spend $33,000." Each student must have $3000 before they enter the country. Further he pointed out that such a policy was further incursion into universities economic affairs.

Business must give more to education

EDMONTON [CUP]—The business sector will have to accept greater financial responsibility for training and manpower development programs at Alberta's post-secondary institutions, according to the province's assistant deputy minister of advanced education and manpower.

Governments will expect business and industry to accept more responsibility than they have in the past, "rather than expecting the public sector and public purse to carry the whole load," Dr. Earl Mansfield told a recent joint conference of the Alberta Association for Continuing Education and the Canada Association for Adult Education.

He said "continuing pressures" will be brought to bear on all levels of the educational system "to devote their energies and resources toward developing people who are able to live successfully in a work-oriented society."

Mansfield also warned post-secondary institutions will find it difficult to ignore questions pertaining to the job prospects of graduates.

"Students who enter programs on the basis of self-interest only with little or no reference to job prospects at the other end, will receive little sympathy when they start yelling that society has shortchanged them because a job is not immediately available," he said.

OSAP only loan choice this year

TORONTO [CUP]—During the academic year of 1975-1976, Ontario university students were given the option of either choosing between Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP), or between the Canadian Student Loan. This year however, this option has been taken away, and instead OSAP is the only choice open to students who are full time members of the university community.

Students got confused when they filled out their application forms. Some students applied for OSAP when they meant to apply for a straight loan and other students applied for a CSL loan when they really wanted to apply for an OSAP loan and grant. Consequently the two loans would be combined to eliminate the confusion.

As a result of this measure, full-time students can no longer apply for a straight loan as opposed to a grant and loan available under OSAP.

Since the loan part of an OSAP grant and loan has gone up from $800 to $1000 this year, students now, are receiving more of a loan than a grant.

Unions, labour tired of lying - John Fraser

by Ross Bartlett

"We must bring labour, management and government together and create a climate of understanding." Failure to do this will bring a repetition of last year "when Canada lost eleven million man-days in strikes, ten million each from alcoholism and accidents and many more from absenteeism. Canada was second only to Italy of the industrialized nations for days lost."

So says John Fraser, Progressive Conservative M.P. from Vancouver South and Tory Labour Critic in the House of Commons. A Tory since age eighteen, the 43 year old lawyer has served the Tories in a number of capacities including president of the British Columbia P.C. association. First elected from Vancouver South in 1972 he was an unsuccessful contender for the party's leadership last February. Fraser addressed an open meeting of the Young P.C.'s on Tuesday regarding the problems of labour and those of Quebec.

Regarding the labour scene, Fraser feels that "what has happened to the CLC in the last year is the most significant in decades. The member unions took the unprecedented step of transferring to the CLC executive the power of calling a general strike." The result was the October 14 "Day of Protest." The significance of this action lies in the fact that local union power is "usually jealously guarded."

As reasons for this unprecedented step Fraser asserted that "labour is tired of being lied to and they are opposed to this form of restraint." Labour's "Manifesto" calls for a tripartite agency of government, management and labour to plan and allocate funds in this nation and the allocation of wealth. While Fraser acknowledges that this may be more than "our parliamentary system can accept, if you go back to why the Manifesto was written you begin to understand what is taking place inside the labour movement in Canada."

"Labour is tired of being talked at," Fraser claims, and it wants to be part of the total government plan, "to be both respectable and responsible." Fraser asserts that because "there are three million organized workers in this country" and that counting husbands and wives, relatives and dependants and so on, "we are talking about six or seven million people" which is a force to be worried about. The placation of labour therefore, is not important "only to the CMA or the Chamber of Congress or John Munro" but to all of us.

Fraser agrees with labour's assertions that "until you get representatives of these three organizations to talk about the state of the economy, the course of the economy and the relative shares that each can take out of the economy" then you will continue to have problems. He denies that labour is the cause of inflation asserting that "you can ignore anyone who says otherwise." Inflation rose and "then labour's demands jumped to keep ahead."

Labour must be placed on an equal footing with management and government, Fraser insists. "Our (the P.C.) challenge is to understand what's taking place inside the labour movement and respond. This party gets a large part of the labour vote yet there has been little attempt to establish a rapport with labour. If we're the government in eighteen months or two years we must repair the rift which now exists."

On the matter of an appropriate response to the recent election in Quebec, Fraser posed two alternatives.

The first is "one of frustration, let them go, we've had it up to our eyeballs with Quebec." This raises a number of rather prickly issues such as, "are you prepared to give up one-quarter of your land mass," what if a percentage don't want to go, problems of sovereignty over sea areas, defense etc. "If you think that there is a nice, tidy way to separate forget it!" Fraser insists there is no constitutional basis for separation. Quebec Premier Rene Levesque "can hold a referendum but we must make sure that it is beaten handsly. A referendum has no legal status and passing one does not make separation a fact. You've got to face the reality that people are going to be very stubborn."

The second response is one of appeasement which Fraser insists "the rest of the country is in no mood for. Neither is the Quebec voter ready to be moved by concessions." Quebec was moved by pride when they voted in the Parti Quebecois. "You can talk as honestly to a Francophone as you can to anyone else in this country," Fraser opined.

"We must show them sincere reasons for this country staying together. It requires on our part a minimum of rhetoric and a determination to show them to go. We must stop this silly nonsense about a national referendum on the issue, since holding such a vote assumes that this country is divisible, which it is not."

Always listening

Dear editor:

George and Sally saunter past a bulletin board, slowing down to look at one of the posters. There's a drawing of a cup of coffee and a telephone above words that read "TAK (Telephone Aid Kingston) is an empathetic listening service." Sally asks, "What's this?" and George replies, "Don't know. Something in case you crack up maybe."

George and Sally are lighthearted but the fact remains that most people have only a vague idea of what TAK is for and who uses it.

The reasoning behind TAK is straight forward. Everyone should have somebody they can talk to. So TAK gathers together ordinary individuals, (nearly all volunteers are students) each wanting to serve as a receptive listener and friend to anyone who calls. On a one-to-one, equal basis they listen to what you want to talk about. Although they have gone through a training program, they are not experts or sages with an intent to lecture or convert, nor do they have a will to convince you of all the rotten mistakes you've made in your life. They wish to relate as a close friend would. You may be assured that what is discussed will be strictly confidential.

Every sort of call is encouraged. It could be inspired by something good.

Money wasted

'Withdraw from OFS'

Dear Editor:

I feel that the referendum of last week solidly illustrated that it is necessary for Queen's students to vote on our membership in the OFS. Queen's students, interested in the issues, solidly showed their non-support of the OFS. We again solidly disagreed with OFS policies, and the non-support clearly illustrates that the OFS has become a liability to the Queen's student. They spend our money supporting issues we oppose. Our membership in the OFS implies our agreement, to the uninformed many.

It seems ridiculous to continue to use OFS meetings as a forum to express the ideas of the Queen's student. They spend our money supporting issues we oppose. Our membership in the OFS implies our agreement to the uninformed many. It seems ridiculous to continue to use OFS meetings as a forum to express the ideas of the Queen's student. If our beliefs are not consistent with their beliefs where is the value of our membership in the OFS?

When the referendum to join the National Union of Students takes place, included with that referendum should be the question of withdrawal from the OFS. The money wasted on these organizations could definitely be far better invested within the Queen's community.

that has happened (like a passing grade in organic chemistry) or by things not so good-like pressures, frustrations, unexpected problems and vague, uneasy feelings that everyone comes across.

The basic reason for phoning TAK is that things go on inside us, and talking about them helps. Once in a while we get hit with bad news, find ourselves in a "fix", get anxious about things that can't be pinned down or simply get angry about a specific issue. We might wish to talk about it, but it possibly isn't the kind of subject where discussion comes easily, or in which people will take an interest. TAK is a tool through which feelings and ideas can be discussed easily and empathetically.

If left unspoken sometimes these things build up inside. By worrying and constantly searching for an answer, the mind may start doing pirouettes and travelling in circles. Dealing with a problem gets thwarted by good, old-fashioned confusion, and more worry. Again, we hesitate in mentioning it to people we know, for different reasons.

But everybody knows how much better we feel when we take the private burden out of ourselves through expressing it to another person. Who hasn't gotten that sense of relief after spilling out a nagging trouble or a previously hidden aspect of oneself to a receptive ear? TAK offers itself as an unconditional friend to every individual (regardless of race, colour, creed or voice pattern).

Still some people are hesitant about phoning a "stranger" to talk about things that matter. One feels "lunny" or uncomfortable in trusting this anonymous listener. But a TAK member has volunteered for the definite purpose of not remaining an uncaring stranger in the day-to-day sea of faces. He or she has faults like everybody. But if they feel they can do one right thing it will be to convince you that they care. Calls are received in the hope that the caller, while remaining anonymous, will feel at ease with a friendly person.

Other people possibly hesitate to phone TAK (the "silent martyr" attitude), reasoning that talking about something shows an inability to solve it on one's own. A wiser approach might be to accept the real value of student. They spend our money supporting issues we oppose. Our membership in the OFS implies our agreement to the uninformed many. It seems ridiculous to continue to use OFS meetings as a forum to express the ideas of the Queen's student. If our beliefs are not consistent with their beliefs where is the value of our membership in the OFS? When the referendum to join the National Union of Students takes place, included with that referendum should be the question of withdrawal from the OFS. The money wasted on these organizations could definitely be far better invested within the Queen's community. name withheld by request

by Elizabeth Klinck

Last Wednesday and Thursday, Queen's students were solicited for their viewpoint on the issues of differential fees for foreign students, and free tuition. As a result of the students' rejection of the latter and support of differential fees, the AMS now finds itself torn between supporting the OFS position or abiding by the outcome of the referendum. Campus Comment asked students to comment on whether or not they felt the AMS should abide by the referendum, as well as what they felt should be the future steps taken by the AMS concerning these issues.

John Goodchild

"The AMS is in a real bind. Basically, once they've committed themselves to a referendum, they must adhere to the results regardless of whether they like them or not, or feel they are indicative of campus opinion." John (Law '77) felt that it was "unfortunate that the AMS did not know the outcome when they committed themselves to having the referendum...they assumed they would get the answer they believed in." He believed that the only purpose of a referendum is to "ask for opinion on which the AMS is to base its policy." John concluded by saying, "If the AMS can't adhere to the referendum then they should do one of two things: resign, if they have any integrity at all, or have another referendum. But what happens, at the next election, if they have a 70 percent turnout?"

Julie Hyndman

"The referendum was, in a way, a farce because the response was so unrepresentative of campus opinion." Julie (Arts '79) felt that the AMS should "definitely have another referendum before any resigning takes place...however, before they do that, they will have to make a bigger splash in the paper to make people aware of the importance of the issue to future students." She commented upon the fact that "a lot of people just don't concern themselves with the problems of higher tuition for foreign students or free tuition...they don't feel motivated to vote on them." Julie summed up her comments by saying that "the turnout for the referendum invalidates the results."

Ron Cameron

"Basically, most of the students on campus just don't give a damn...they're only here for four years and they don't care about what goes on when they get out of here." Ron (first year Politics) felt that there must be "a better way of informing the students about the referendum...it is not just their right, but their duty to get involved and vote on issues such as the two presented last week." He felt that the AMS should "find another way to poll the students...they shouldn't abide by the referendum, it was just a 22 percent turnout, it can't be valid." Ron concluded by saying, "The AMS doesn't have the right to say one thing or another."

David Eadie

"I don't think that they should abide by the referendum...22 percent of the Queen's Campus is not a majority." Dave (Arts '77) commented that "it was not a question that ever should have come to referendum...the answer to both questions would have been no, no to free tuition, and no to a differentiation in fees." He felt that "the whole problem is, regardless of whether or not the AMS does anything, it won't matter because, in the end, it's a governmental decision. Nothing can be done by the university students." Dave's concluding remark was "basically, it is now a question of conscience for the AMS."

Star Trek report

It's just another phaser I'm going through

by Daniel R. Woolf

It's Monday, 4:55 P.M. People are dragging themselves into the residence after a gruelling day of classes, labs, meals at Leonard Cafeteria, etc.

I wander down to the Gordon House Common Room. It is deserted. "Sanford and Son" is just finishing. Theme music...station identification...commercials...

Suddenly the door bursts open. Five or six people join me, grab a chair and move around the T.V. 4:59, and ten or so more people pour in. Several of them have rushed through supper, which starts at 4:45, gulping down their food in order to get here by 5:00.

5:00 P.M. We all listen attentively and hear those words we could recite on our heads: "Space, the final frontier. These are the voyages...etc." You guessed it. Star Trek is on the air, and the Trekkies (a term most of us despise, but which I will use for the sake of brevity and convenience) of Gordon-Brockington Hall are loyally watching. Similar scenes are taking place in Lower Vic and Morris, as well as, needless to say, hundreds of homes across Kingston.

It's rather hard to figure out exactly why this old, worn, decrepit sci-fi show, eight years off the air, can still have such phenomenal drawing power. After all, it's not as if there's a single episode of this show that the Trekkies - at least the hard-core ones like myself, Dave N., Tim B., P.C.M. - have not seen three or four times. Most of us can name the title and stars and recite the entire script backwards before Spock has once uttered, "Illogical, Captain."

Nevertheless, Star Trek exerts a great influence over the residence and, indeed, the university. The average Trekkie will spend an hour a day (minimal) watching the show and probably the next hour musing over the scientific theory of some new gadget Captain Kirk has used, or some funny line Dr. McCoy had about Vulcans. For example:

6:00 P.M. - An episode has just finished: "The Doomsday Machine." Not one of my personal favourites, but still quite good. I walk over to a group of individuals who watch Get Smart instead - sorry about that, Chief - and eat with several of my compatriots. Tim B. orates on the physics of the transporter, and Dave N., whose favourite episode was the above-mentioned, is raving about how good it was and why isn't it on more often and why Leonard Nimroy should be elected president...

The truth is that now, in 1976, eight years after its cancellation by N.B.C., this horse-opera of the universe is experiencing a resurgence across not just Queen's, but the world. The Trek Conventions have never been more active. Star Trek manuals and blueprints are being printed. Mad Magazine has just published "Keep on Trekkin'" (a musical version of you-know-what), and most importantly, THE RE-RUNS ARE BACK! In Kingston, you can see it every day except Saturday (when Space: 1999 provides a few such as myself with a tasteless, but nutritious surrogate) and twice on Monday. In Toronto you can watch twelve hours a week.

Why does it exert this power? Do we enjoy watching Spock count to twelve with his ears (doubtful), listening to Kirk's eloquent impromptu speeches (unlikely), or do we simply like the commercials (ridiculous)? (Admittedly, the Trekkies in Vic are fond of the Channel Seven news reader and his daily ad.)

I don't think so. Many would agree that there have been more action-packed Voyage-to-the-Bottom-of-the-Time-Tunnel-of-Lost-in-Space-Invasions-in-a-Land-of-the-Giants type shows of the past, or slick modern imports such as U.F.O. and Space: 1999. Somehow, Star Trek has an attraction for those who want a better world, those who enjoy a classic show and those, like myself, who can for an hour escape a world of essays, tubbings, Saga Food (just kidding, Brian!) and enter a world of the future.

Let the network kill it, or fail to go ahead with plans for a feature movie and a new series in 1978. The seventy-nine shows made to date will always be revered. After all, Star Trek is the only series in history to have an episode shown in the film vaults of the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, D.C.

I guess that's what comes of a free "Enterprise" system.

A fact of life

Last Saturday, the Queen's Homophile Association rented the Law Lounge for their annual dinner. During the evening, no less than seven of my "liberated" colleagues in Law came up to me in the Law Library and asked what QHA was doing there. Such choice remarks were offered, as: "You should keep those fags out of here, my locker is down there, but no way I'm going near it."

Over the past few months I've become increasingly aware that Queen's does in fact have a palpable ill-feeling towards homosexuals.

Before we take it upon ourselves to persecute these people, it is in order to consider a few facts about their inclinations. Homosexuality is no new phenomenon - the ancient Greeks described it well.

Anthropologists have documented it as prevalent across cultural boundaries - so you can find it amongst the Trobriand Islanders and the Ba Mbutu Pygmies as you might in advanced western cultures. Nor is the homosexual tendency one uniquely human - animal psychologists have observed and demonstrated it in other primates. The only conclusion from these observations is that homosexuality is probably a biologically determined phenomenon.

That it is an inclination which affects only a small proportion of people leads to the conclusion that it is not the "norm" to be homosexual. Similarly the total absence of wisdom teeth in certain people is also not the norm, approximately 1 percent of the population being so fortunate. No one would contend that people lacking wisdom teeth are sick or disgusting because they are not "normal". In the same vein, homosexuality does not deserve to be labelled as sick or disgusting because it is not "normal". That it is, or has been thought of as "sick" has little to do with its limited prevalence, but moreso without acquired unthinking values about what is proper or what does not offend our sensibilities.

Historically homosexuality may have been deplored, as was perhaps sodomy with females, on the grounds that these practices were contraceptive in an era when children and population meant wealth and progress respectively. Lack of population is no longer a problem, so why do we harbour such fatuous attitudes?

The parliament of Canada has seen fit to de-criminalize homosexuality, probably in response to an enlightened attitude respecting "crimes without victims". The homosexual sex act between consenting adults has no victim - the law has admitted it has no more jurisdiction in the homosexual's bedroom than in that of husbands and wives.

On Saturday night, I went to my locker where I spoke with another law student. We passed two fellows arm in arm looking at the bulletin board. My friend said, "in principle I don't mind, but in real life it offends me." Isn't there something fundamentally sick about a society that is offended by two human beings showing affection for one another when we are capable of enjoying violence and bloodshed Hollywood style in the name of entertainment?

If we are offended by homosexual conduct, we are out of habit. In Canada we have had "unseemly language legislation" for many years. Under these laws, people using unseemly or obscene language in a public place may be prosecuted.

There are cases reported in the '30s where individuals went to prison for using the words "hell" or "damn" in a public place. In 1976, the very little old ladies who were offended in 1930 by "hell" or "damn" are saying "hell" and "damn" among other things. Our sensibilities have changed - what did offend us does no longer. Similarly it may be our sensibilities that cause us

Will you vote here?

by Jim Klein

Much has been written lately concerning how a Queen's student might vote most responsibly. Some maintain that we have some "native" responsibility to vote in Kingston while The Journal has been interpreted as denying that any student can thoughtfully contribute to local politics by voting.

At the risk of displaying a lower political consciousness, I would like to suggest a more subjective approach. One's vote seems best cast, whether on "barren ground" or not, in the home of one's concerns.

Lost in the shuffle of local issues is the proxy voting made possible through the miracle of Canadian mail. This is the traditional recourse of first-year students unfamiliar with local issues, and upper-year students who feel that their electoral loyalties still lie "back home."

I can't believe that residence life is the only factor capable of insulating a Queen's student from local politics. The question of where to vote can't be answered in a vacuum - that is, apart from consideration of the issues and personalities involved.

It is by no means irresponsible for any student to vote in his hometown if he reasonably expects to live with the long-term consequences there. Suppose the mayor of one's own locale is appealing a criminal conviction - should the elector feel that this is somehow bound up with the incumbent's fitness to govern who can blame him for wanting to vote by proxy?

Many municipal issues, like planning and financing, are long-term issues. The student could most expect short-term benefit from the alderman of his ward - say, someone to phone when the cockroaches are absconding with the sofa and public health has him on hold.

A student vote for education board may be closer still to fruitless. Neither having experience of the system nor plans to raise his children in Kingston, a student might be inspired to responsible choice solely by general educational concerns. Hometown circumstances - say, a board ground to a standstill by personality conflicts - may make another good case for proxy voting.

Where should a Queen's student vote? Where he or she can vote most responsibly, which criterion is not met without careful and personal consideration.

to "react" to homosexual conduct in public, when in principle we should see no problem with it. Let us stand by sound principles and admit to a fact of life that has always had that status.

Peripheral Visions

Every year during orientation week, it seems that more and more frosh are hoping to get into medical school. This is a noble and virtuous ambition but unfortunately a lovely motive cannot always be maintained by a lovely method. To illustrate the reality of medical school competition I will tell you the story of my friend Herby.

Herby grew up in Kingston and by the time he was ready to go to Queen's he still had a burning desire to become a doctor. This sort of ambition calls for much more than long hours of homework, but Herby had been instructed in the ins and outs of medical competition by his mother, a bold figure of a woman who also decided that her son become a doctor. First she gave him razor blades to cut recommended readings out of library books so that he could keep them permanently. "It's only minor surgery," she would tease, placing a substantial number of razor blades in his lunch bag. All this maneuver accomplished, however, was a trip to AMS Court.

You see, Herby was frisked by several, burly AMS constables prior to entering the coffee shop where he hoped to eat his lunch. In order to satisfy himself that Herby wasn't carrying a bomb, the constable placed Herby's lunch bag on the ground and proceeded to jog on the spot all over it in his bare feet. This earned the constable several deep cuts and Herby a trip to AMS court.

Herby was acquitted in court, thanks to a brilliant defense by Howard Smith, Journal columnist and third-year law student. Howard pleaded that Herby was a despicable pervert bent on obtaining sexual favours from young girls; (the razor blades were used to back up his threats). Howard argued that this was not without social utility. As Howard put it: "Six out of every ten females my client threatens are statistically destined to reach the age of sixty-five at which point the intra-cranial injection of a .22 calibre bullet will be performed by qualified medical staff where euthanasia is indicated. My client's fatal actions relieve the burdens of the taxpayer and our medical manpower, years in advance of their necessity. On the other hand, females who encourage my client's advances will be freed from the socially useless and unrealistic condition of virginity. It's not as if people were born virgins you know."

Herby's mother would also rub her pet cat in his face before he left for school in the morning. She knew that Herby was allergic to cats, but she hoped he would take advantage of it by sneezing all over his classmates' bacterial cultures, jeopardizing their results in the laboratory. Ideally, this would be done without their knowledge. For example, when someone was seen leaving the lab with a pair of scissors, it meant he was going to the library and would be gone for some time.

After lectures, most of the budding young medics would dart up to the front to ask the professor questions. Herby's mother demanded that he do this as well. Everyday he would come home from school and she would ask if he had made any social inroads with prominent professors, any "connections." Herby would try to lie but was generally unable to look his mother in the eye. This usually earned him a washing out of the mouth with soap, partly for lying, partly for not making any "connections."

His mother, who does all of Herby's course selection and sectioning, finally devised a simple solution to Herby's lack of social initiative. From that point on, she attended all of Herby's classes with him. She would sit beside him in every lecture, conspicuous in her brown fur coat and blue hat. She spoon fed him lots of chicken soup and other "brain foods" while Herby jotted down notes. When the professor called for questions or comments, Herby's hand would flap in the air. This didn't mean he had a question or comment. He simply knew that his mother would not stop burying her high heel in his foot until he raised his hand. Herby grew accustomed to this system without complaining. His only trauma came when he was daydreaming in a boring lecture and was suddenly jarred awake by: "My son disagrees." It was his mother's booming voice.

My Son, the Doctor

so his nervousness grew worse. For two years he had led the most dismal existence between Millhaven and RMC. His mind jangled with the seeming importance of the event, and he was almost electrocuted when the secretary told him he was next. He sprinted into the interviewer's office, stood at attention, stared at the ceiling, and screamed "I don't want to blow it," several dozen times. He then paused and distinctly heard himself pass wind, a normal physiological manifestation of nervousness. Realizing he had just "blown it," he sank to the floor, relieving himself simultaneously at both ends before fainting.

The secretary revived Herby with smelling salts, which are in supply at the medical admissions office.

"Don't worry son," said the interviewer. "We've called your Mother and she'll be right over." Ever since Herby received this information from the interviewer he has been, in the opinion of most physicians, clinically dead. He lies comatose in a private hospital room, linked to a life-support system. His brain waves, in protest against an insane world, have gone flat. His mother, dauntless but forgiving, sits by his bed reading him passages out of "Introductory Organic Chemistry" by Lawson and Smith, two fine scientists indeed. Above his head there is a sign nailed to the wall.

It bears the message of this story. It says: "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." I wish I had known that when I was in first year.

Festering Sores

Canada has a population of approximately 23 million. The human race now numbers over 4 billion. Quick arithmetic will show that just over one half of one percent of all people are Canadians. This would seem to be an entirely manageable number of people to have in a modern nation state, especially given the relative wealth of this vast territory. Yet, at this moment, the nation is beset with political troubles which threaten its continuation as a political entity. There exist a conflagration of political issues which make this at least as important an era as the time of Confederation. To gain a sense of the fundamental social "dangers" about us, it might be helpful to review briefly the chief issues which are going to domestically dominate in the near future.

Canada as a federal experiment is an association of disparate regions reflecting various differences in language, culture, affluence, etc. There are strong and legitimate feelings of regional identifications in every part of the country which make Canadian nationalism a delicate and ephemeral notion.

The national Liberal party, traditionally the successful "centralist" party, is in utter disarray. Prime Minister Trudeau is tremendously unpopular, and his Government has had many months of unrelieved crisis. From Sky Shops to the Judges Affair, Otto Lang's extravagance and suspicious fishing trips, the present Government has presented itself as singularly inefficient. It has succeeded in alienating Canadians like nothing else since the Pipeline debates of two decades ago. The Auditor General's recent report is a final testament to the incompetency and confusion of the present Government and Civil Service.

Canada's balance of payments deficit is nearing an intolerable level. This, the most energy-intensive nation on earth, is in need of increasing amounts of increasingly expensive foreign oil. This state of affairs has been dictated by the lack of coherent national energy policy.

Fundamental debate exists about the nature of foreign investment and control in Canada. While this debate proceeds the economy limps onward, thus giving everyone—worker, politician, housewife—a sense of helplessness about the economic future.

The chief threat to Canada, of course, lies in the potential separation of Quebec. All eyes seem to be on the PQ. It is as if the key to the mental health of the nation lies with the outcome of the Quebec Nationalism issue.

One must reserve the greatest pessimism for the question of political leadership: Is there anyone who can pull the pieces together, with or without Quebec, and stave off social instability? French Canada does not care, and in English Canada the murmurs are of Joe Clark and John Turner. That choice is hellishly uninspiring, because it leads, in either case, to more of the same. Canada's ennui and disintegration will be halted only if an open and innovative leadership emerges. This nation has the aura of a driverless runaway vehicle, and no one on the horizon seems capable of stopping it.

McQueen replies to Russell

Dear Editor:

At the risk of being temporarily somewhat repetitive, I wish to first of all rephrase my basic assertion in terms which I hope Mr. Russell will be able to understand. By positing as the sole alternative to Mr. David's advocacy of political apathy the most firmly entrenched and widely accepted features of the currently prevalent variety of supposedly participatory "democracy," Mr. Russell in his original letter espouses a defense of the "status quo" (as he so brilliantly points out in his second letter I was, indeed, quoting from the headline which appeared over the first letter, not from the actual text.) This defense is much more efficacious than Mr. David's suggestions. This is, as I point out, true for the simple reason that what Mr. David advocates is not this currently prevalent system, but rather an essentially fascist attempt at muzzling all dissent.

Whether or not one agrees with this position, it is hardly liable to Mr. Russell's claim that it is "empty rhetoric." It is a sincere and theoretically sound analysis of a political posture. The fact that this analysis differs from Mr. Russell's own point of view does not turn it into "empty rhetoric." Indeed, Mr. Russell's position that such an analysis is mere "empty rhetoric" is itself an implicit advocacy of political apathy, except within a certain narrow spectrum circumscribed by his own beliefs.

Mr. Russell's attempt to deny his acceptance and approval of what he calls "the established political order" rests upon an attempt to either 1) disavow his advocacy of "issues...voters...candidates...and democracy", or 2) disassociate these entities from identification with this "order." Neither is feasible. Hence, his statement that he "made no judgement about the established political order" is untenable. After all, if he does not condone political participation within an "order" defined by these entities, wherein lies the purpose of replying to Mr. David?

With regard to Mr. Russell's analysis of my own letter, a couple of exceptionally objectionable particulars should be clarified. It should, first of all, be pointed out that I attribute only the term "authoritarian" to Mr. Russell. Mr. Russell will note that the term does appear in his original letter. In fact, it is strongly associated with Mr. David's position. In any event, my first letter, by attributing only the term "authoritarian" to Mr. Russell, certainly did nothing to justify Mr.

Russell's claim that this letter implies that he "referred to Mr. David as a fascist."

As to Mr. Russell's dramatic closing flourish ("Someone who is politically apathetic is self-evidently not a 'fascist'"), the question of whether or not a person who is politically apathetic is also a fascist depends upon the nature of the regime condoned by his or her apathy. Moreover, Mr. David himself is not in any sense apathetic in his own advocacy of political apathy. His statement in the Journal is a political one. It seeks to initiate a change of Queen's University into "an apolitical university." This is certainly a change of a "political" nature. How Mr. Russell is able to refer to Mr. David as "politically apathetic" is beyond me. It will be recalled that Mr. Russell wrote a 900-word letter to the Journal in response to the supposedly apathetic Mr. David.

Mr. Russell's confusion apparently stems basically from an inability to conceive of a non-apathectic alternative to a regime which espouses the most firmly-entrenched features of what I and a Journal headline writer both term the "status quo." This confusion is exacerbated by his stubborn and unfounded refusal to recognize it, and unfortunately, by his equally unfounded attempt to discredit my clarification of it.

Perception on 'China Week'

Dear Editor:

I would like to express some of my personal perception about a programme called 'China Week' that will be held between January 31 and February 5 of 1977. This programme is a joint function of five Canadian universities' Chinese Student Associations. One of the main goals is to promote friendship and cultural exchange between Chinese and Canadians.

Unfortunately, this event has never been actually approved by the majority of the Queen's Chinese Club members nor the executives but has been put forward by a relatively small group of interested members. The organizing committee is in principle under the authorization of the Queen's Chinese Club but it has become physically independent. Since the programme was made known to various departments of the University and sponsorships were received from them, the programme is now unable to be dissolved. But many unforeseen difficulties may arise from the politically sensitive Queen's Chinese community. (Majority of them adopt the policy of absolute political neutrality towards the Communist rule in China.) They incline to interpret some of the programmes as propaganda. Questions about the objective of the organizing committee has been raised but replies were unconvincing and doubtful. Since most members of the Club carry the usual attitude of 'Don't Care', there is insufficient intervention so as to ensure that the programmes will be healthy and non-politically biased.

Here, I like to express my deepest anxiety and concern about the possible consequences of 'China Week' that might lead to the split up of the Club and the destruction of harmony within the Queen's Chinese community. I hope the Chinese Club

A.M.S. not babysitters

Dear Editor:

The Underground, since its opening in frosh week, has been a subject of great controversy, and in my opinion this is due to the growing number of irresponsible individuals attending Queen's each year.

It is unfortunate that a university of this size has such a small capacity pub. The resulting line-ups which form every Friday and Saturday night are not getting any smaller even though temperatures continue to drop.

After frosh-week and numerous complaints from those waiting in line, it was decided by myself and the other members of the AMS constable staff, to initiate a line-up control program. We have been posting a constable to supervise the line-up on weekend nights from seven to eight o'clock. This lone constable must watch over three or four hundred prospective pub patrons covering over half a block. The pub manager is not willing to pay for any more than one constable on line-up duty.

We have provided this babysitting service even though it is not within our jurisdiction and it would be more effective if people would stand up for their rights and tell people attempting to butt in to go to the back of the line.

Another problem in the pub occurs when someone waiting in line wishes to enter the pub whether or not he wants to wait in line any longer. He gives his student card to the constable at the door stating "I just want to see if my friends are here or not I'll be back in a minute." Often this is abused when the individual sits down for half an hour and has a beer. When I encounter this problem I approach the person that he or she has the choice of leaving right now with his card or picking up his card at the AMS office the following week. This "give card-go look" procedure is a service we are not obligated to provide but do so to accommodate most of the responsible students.

The new pub has become one of the more demanding events a constable has to work. We do not like to see people waiting in line any more than they do and we try to do our best to seat people as quickly and comfortably as possible.

We do not want to be considered bouncers and we do not like to think of ourselves as babysitters.

Apartment dwellers are Kingstonians

Dear Editor:

As one of the aldermen responsible for representing the interests of many Queen's students on Kingston City Council, I wish to respond to your editorial of Friday, November 19 ("The Responsible Vote").

During my past two-year term of office as one of the aldermen for Sydenham Ward (the area which includes the main Queen's campus), students have accounted for a large portion of the requests for information and assistance I have received. Students have contacted me to offer their ideas and expertise as well.

Students living in university residences can, understandably, feel little interest in Kingston municipal politics. But if, next year, they move into a house or apartment in the city, they will find many issues involving their municipal government. They will ask the city's property standards officers and health and fire inspectors to insist on improvements to their house or apartment. They will want improved street lighting and sidewalks, better recreational facilities, more convenient bus routes and schedules. They will need information regarding parking regulations, garbage collection, dog licensing and so on. Students should expect the city, and their aldermen in particular, to deal with these problems and answer their questions.

Students living off campus will find they are part of the Kingston community - and as part of this community they have a responsibility to participate in the process of community decision-making by becoming informed on local issues, by contacting their representatives when necessary, and by voting.

The Alma Mater Society, during the past two years, has encouraged Queen's-City dialogue. AMS executive officers have been active in many aspects of city life, and the AMS has supported services available to citizens in the community as a whole, as well as to Queen's students.

If Queen's students are "neither particularly well-informed about nor interested in local issues", as your editorial states, the Queen's Journal has a responsibility to provide information and perhaps create greater awareness of local issues among students.

Lois Miller

Ed. Note: The Journal is presently preparing for an election issue to appear December 3. We will carry photographs and the platforms of all candidates for Mayor, Alderman, and School Board, in Victoria and Sydenham Wards. Candidates will be contacted by the Journal.

Journal at fault

Dear Editor:

In an editorial printed on Friday (Nov. 19th), the Journal accused Queen's students of being ignorant concerning the upcoming civic election. Well if this is so, it is at least partly the Journal's fault. The irony of a newspaper reproaching its readers for being ill-informed is something in itself, but an article I submitted for the NDP column two weeks ago dealt with that very subject.

Yet because of a change in editorial policy made AFTER THE ARTICLE WAS SUBMITTED, my article was not published until last Tuesday (Nov. 23rd). By that time, my article, written from the point of view of the situation before nominations for civic office closed, was out of date. Since then Mr. Peter Fountas has declared himself a candidate in Ontario ward.

The Journal was contacted three times and told that the article needed updating and each time a representative of the Journal promised that something was being done. In fact, nothing was done. I am, I think, understandably annoyed with the Journal's cavalier attitude toward my article. Apologies are in order.

Eleanor Bartlett

Ed. note: The Journal will be rotating the political columns in consecutive issues. Our apologies are in order both to Ms. Bartlett and Mr. Fountas

Avis blasts back

Dear Editor:

Almost every issue of The Journal causes me to sigh resignedly and wonder if it is worth my time to attempt a rebuttal of your fatuous logic and misrepresentations of fact. However, Tuesday's editorial marks a new low in cheap-shot, inflammatory journalism, thus demanding some response.

As you know, I disagree with your views on the wisdom of holding referenda, but I agree entirely that the use of such a vote as an "opinion poll" makes no sense. Now that the votes are in, I suggest that the only reasonable response is to treat both as though they were binding referenda. It would indeed be intolerable to ignore such an expression of student opinion.

However, you seem to have jumped the gun in insinuating that these votes will be ignored. Outer Council has had no opportunity to meet since the referendum, but when it does, I expect that it will take the position consistent with the views of the majority of students who voted last week. It is purely bush league editorializing to claim that "we have learned that our representatives will likely choose to ignore the campus position..." From whom have you learned this? On what grounds do you believe it? Such allegations do a great disservice to members of Council and, I might add, to your readers.

I fail to see that the A.M.S. is placed in any particular bind. There is nothing wrong with changing one's position on the basis of a referendum even when it is called on "opinion poll", to do so is simply an illustration of democratic process. I have never had any qualms about taking a minority position at O.F.S. We are not obliged to adhere to policy decisions taken at O.F.S.; our policy directives come from the Outer Council and from the student body. In the light of this I found it difficult to understand The Journal's emphasis in its report of Outer Council on alleged problems that might arise if the referenda turned out contrary to O.F.S. policy. Perhaps The Journal ought to brush up on its understanding of the structure of student government at Queen's and at O.F.S.

I have never felt that warfare between the A.M.S. and The Journal was productive. However, it seems that you have thrown down the gauntlet. You have developed a habit of insinuation and innuendo that must be stopped. It appears that Queen's may suffer from the same plague that ails contemporary society in general - an irresponsible press.

James C. Avis

Ed. Note:

The information that the result of the poll might well be ignored came from AMS External Affairs Commissioner and member of the O.F.S. executive, Hugh Christie.

Differential fees: differing opinions

Dear Editor:

I would suspect that R.A. Hachett's recent article was an attempt to evoke discussion and not really serious. Since I do not know for sure I will treat his article entitled "We are selfish, blind" as serious.

My response to the article is that Queen's students are neither selfish nor blind. Most of the students here who are interested in getting an education are not at all interested in condoning or supporting the freeloaders of the system, who may be better off getting their type of education in the real world. Look around.

There is no need to delve into this further as there are many examples of the above type of person at Queen's and furthermore I think Isadora Lodge did a more than adequate job covering this issue in her recent letter to the Editor.

The issue of differential fees is one very often

Dear Editor:

As a foreign student on Campus, but one who will not be subject to higher fees because he registered this year, I would like to make the following comments.

It seems the issue of differential fees is shrouded in the mists of confusion. No one, except perhaps those who voted (or were they just expressing an opinion?), has considered why there would be higher fees for foreign students.

Perhaps the fact that the vote went against fee tuition and equal fees expresses a fear that there is a shortage (whatever that may mean) of higher education. In this sense the vote is internally consistent, for a higher price of education will almost surely induce a decrease in demand. Likewise, increasing the price of education to foreign students will deter them from registering at Ontario universities. There are after all other universities around the world which offer equivalent levels of education (in some cases at lower prices). Substitution of these other universities for Ontario institutions will occur. The real problem for those concerned about the amount of foreign aid Canada is misinterpreted by people not accustomed to thinking for themselves. The term differential fees does not imply categorizing all foreign students together and charging them all the same exorbitant rate.

It means making foreign students pay at least the going rate in their own country for a comparable education in Canada. Notice that this automatically provides for the needs of students of poorer countries where a comparable education may not be available at all! In countries where a comparable education is available the student would be faced with adjusting to his own system or paying a slightly higher arbitrary rate for an education in Canada.

Surely Canada is not a refuge for freeloaders from other countries.

handing out (and not the shortage of education in Ontario), is how many students will not receive university education at all because of the differential fee.

These remarks aside, I must question two points which have cropped up in recent Journal editorials. Firstly, when discussing the issue of differential fees the Journal implicitly answered that students from "rich" countries must also be rich in terms of the dollars and cents in their pocket. As a logical proposition this does not necessarily follow. Secondly, in the latest edition, it was noted that the distinction between an opinion poll and a referendum was "not profound." Yet there is one case when the difference is profound. What people do, and what they say they will do may bear little resemblance when the chips are down. If indeed last week's vote constitutes a mandate, then the A.M.S. should follow that mandate. However a poll which predicts that an incumbent will lose a forthcoming election does not require that he or she resign.

The desperate struggle for survival

Canadian University Press

Threatened with the destruction of their society by encroaching industrial development, the Indians of the Northwest Territories—a vast area over two million square miles in northern Canada—are demanding that the government recognize their right to self-determination.

Leaders of the 7,000 Indians filed a formal demand with the Canadian government October 25 for ownership rights and separate political jurisdiction over the federally administered area. Their demand encompasses all the Northwest Territories not included in a similar claim made by 15,000 Eskimos to the federal government in February.

"What we are demanding is nothing short of a universal human right," George Erasmus, president of the Indian Brotherhood of the Northwest Territories, told Canada's Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs Oct. 25.

George Kodakin, a chief from Fort Franklin, put the position succinctly: "We wish to see our children enjoy a good life," he said, in the Slavey dialect "We wish to live as a people. We wish to survive as a people."

The Dene (meaning "people" in the Native dialects) position puts them into direct conflict with the consortium of Canadian and American multi-national oil corporations, who want to build a pipeline for Alaskan and Mackenzie River delta oil and gas directly through Indian land. But the Indians say they have never surrendered the land to the Canadian government, and they want their claims settled before pipeline construction begins. The Dene are backed by a large majority of Canadian public opinion.

The Dene want the government to recognize their aboriginal rights to use and occupy the land they have lived on for centuries. But, in past land settlements with Native people the Canadian government have demanded that their aboriginal rights be extinguished in exchange for compensation for their land. At James Bay in northern Quebec, for instance, a huge settlement was negotiated last year, so that a $20 billion hydroelectric project could be built to supply the flooding and strip-mining of traditional Dene lands. The Dene has recently refused a cash settlement from the Canadian government.

Unlike in the U.S. most Canadian Indian tribes were never conquered by government forces. Instead, they signed what they thought were peace and friendship treaties. But the treaties were later used to force Indians off their lands and onto reserves.

The Dene, too, signed what they thought to be peace and friendship treaties in the 1920's. But, as George Erasmus, of the Northwest Territories Indian Brotherhood pointed out in an interview, they were later found to be fraudulent.

"The only legal instrument that can be used to say that the Dene are part of Canadian society is the treaties. That is the only legal instrument that can be used to bind the Dene to Canada," Erasmus explained. "And they are fraudulent. We've taken the federal government to court over them. They're not truthful at all."

"The way our old people recognize the treaties is as treaties between nations. Up until the time of the treaties, the Dene people had always made decisions for themselves; had always decided how they were going to live on the land. And it was land that they had historically lived on."

"You're not going to tell me that a treaty party that goes through the communities, in an hour and a half in some cases, is going to persuade people somehow or other to give up all of their historical rights to the land, to be able to govern themselves. It's just absolutely impossible."

"It does not take a very astute man to see that the idea of 'negotiating' the extinguishment of one's political rights is ludicrous," says Erasmus. "For us, negotiation is a process leading to a mutually acceptable conclusion. 'Agreement' is a word which cannot be used to describe an imposed solution. Agreements cover non-exploitive relationships and it is such an agreement which the Dene seek to attain with the people of Canada. It is the principle of self-determination which differentiates the Dene position from all previous examples of 'settlements' imposed by the federal government on the aboriginal peoples of Canada."

The Dene demanded the Canadian government accept some basic principles before negotiations on settling outstanding Dene land claims can proceed, including:

- the rights to recognition, self-determination and ongoing growth and development of the Dene as a people,
- the right to establish a separate

Dene government within the framework of the Canadian constitution;

- the right of the Dene to keep enough of their land to ensure their independence and self-reliance;
- the right to practice and preserve their own languages, traditions, customs and values; and
- the right to develop their own institutions and enjoy their rights as a people within the framework of those institutions.

The Dene struggle in the Northwest Territories has become the focal point for Native opposition to government racism. Central to the struggle is the Dene Declaration, adopted at an assembly in 1975, which sets forth the theoretical groundwork on which the Dene nation concept is based. Comparing themselves to "the people of the Third World who have fought for and won the right to self-determination," The declaration demands that the Canadian government recognize the Dene as a nation.

George Erasmus explained, "This Dene nation idea that we're talking about, all we're talking about is the recognition of what is already ours; recognition of something we've never given up. This is what the Dene Declaration is all about. It's an historical statement. It's a fact in our history."

Whether the Canadian government will recognize that fact, however, is another matter. The government has consistently sided with the oil interests at the expense of the Native people in the past. And Canada's new energy policy commits the country to increasing volumes of oil and gas exports to the U.S. in the future.

The Dene, it appears, have a hard uphill struggle ahead of them. Between them and the settlement of their claims to sovereignty stands the plan to build a 2,400-mile pipeline worth in the neighbourhood of $8 billion, which the multinational energy corporations are eager to start.

It don't come easy: a look at Greenpeace

Greenpeace anti-sealing crew in Newfoundland in March, 1976

by Greg Petnold

It's McLuhanesque warfare. We're firing images rather than missiles at each other. That's the way change is going to happen now, by firing mind bombs at people through the delivery system of the mass media." (Bob Hunter, President, Greenpeace Foundation.)

It has been just over five years since the original "Greenpeace" sailed out of Vancouver harbour with twelve volunteers aboard, bound for Amchitka Island in the Aleutians, to protest underground nuclear testing by the U.S. government.

The chartered 80-foot fishing boat retreated to Vancouver after 42 days at sea beset by deteriorating weather, delays in the nuclear test program and the vagaries of the U.S. Coast Guard, who arrested the vessel for violation of a customs technicality. A replacement ship, the "Greenpeace Too", was still 700 miles from Amchitka when the bomb was detonated.

Yet the final box score was irrelevant because the Greenpeace voyages had succeeded in raising public indignation across Canada. In the last days preceding the test, Toronto broadcasters Pierre Berton and Charles Templeton gathered an incredible 180,000 signatures for a half-mile-long telegram delivered to the White House in several cardboard cartons. Ontario students briefly closed three international bridges—the Blue Water at Sarnia, the Ambassador at Windsor and the Rainbow at Niagara Falls.

Press, radio and TV across Canada picked up the story while the Toronto Star even published a regular column written from aboard "Greenpeace I." Greenpeace used the resources of the media intentionally to provide a rallying point for people concerned with environmental issues and a normally lethargic government was forced to respond to the prodding.

The publicity generated in Canada and the U.S. was sufficient for the U.S. Supreme Court to be called into special session to consider cancellation of the Amchitka blast on environmental grounds. A margin of only one vote allowed the test to proceed. One such uproar was enough for the American government. In the following spring, the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission closed down the Amchitka test site, turning the entire island into a bird sanctuary.

Minister of the Environment Jack Davis referred to the test as a "travesty of justice." Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau tried in vain to contact the Greenpeace I by radio-telephone to convey his best wishes and issued a statement. "We believed all such tests should be halted. There can be no mistake as to the depth of Canadian public concern in this matter." Greenpeace's star had risen.

This was only the beginning. At the end of April 1972, Greenpeace III set sail for the Murora Atoll several hundred miles from Tahiti to protest French nuclear tests. This second voyage released a storm of criticism against France from around the world. New Zealand launched an action in the International Court of Justice. Greenpeaceers journeyed to France to meet with French environmental groups and visited Rome, obtaining an audience with the Pope.

In the Spring of 1974, opposition to the tests in France became a major issue. After a near-defeat at the polls, the ruling Gaullist party announced the 1974 test series would be France's final atmospheric tests.

After the successes of Amchitka and Murora, the Greenpeace Foundation announced in January, 1975, that it was diverting its energies to the problem of the slaughter of the shrinking population of the world's great whales.

Five of eight species of the great whales were commercially extinct and the remainder were used for spurious, replaceable ingredients in industrial lubricants, margarine, cat food and cosmetics.

A new form of sea-going confrontation was employed to disrupt the whale hunt. Greenpeace members linked up with the whaling fleets at sea and placed their boats between the whalers and their victims as shields to prevent the firing of harpoons, without the risk of human lives.

The project was dubbed "Project Jonah."

The Greenpeace V set out on April 27, 1975 and finally made contact with a Russian fleet consisting of one, 350-foot factory ship and nine 150-foot "killer" boats, each equipped with nine, 50mm cannons. The Greenpeace crew were deployed in high-speed rubber inflatables between a Russian killer boat and a group of sperm whales. The harpooner was blocked for some 45 minutes, then he fired—regardless of the risk to the people in their rubber dinghy.

To avoid the confrontation and cameras, the fleet chose to steam away. The clash had saved eight whales.

In London, the International Whaling Commission agreed to reduce its 1976 quotas approximately 23 percent from 1975's 37,300, but the Greenpeace Foundation was demanding a ten-year moratorium. Plans were laid to send out a larger, faster vessel in the next year.

Over the winter a fresh controversy erupted. The harp seal population on Canada's east coast was being decimated. At the turn of the century an estimated twenty million harp seals made a yearly trip to the icefields of the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the Front ice off the coast of Labrador and Newfoundland to give birth to the new generation. A 1975 study using ultra-violet photography from the air indicated there was only 700,000 to 800,000 seals left.

With the financial assistance of the International Fund for Animal Welfare, Greenpeace developed an innovative plan—volunteers armed with spray cans of a green organic dye would fly in by helicopter and mark all the seal pups possible, rendering their pelts commercially worthless.

The federal government reacted swiftly, declaring that the Greenpeace would kill the seals with the dye. What the government neglected to mention was that their own researchers had employed such dyes for twenty years and that Federal Fisheries scientist had advised Greenpeace that the dye would not harm the seals.

Just days before the hunt was to get under way, Federal Fisheries Minister, Romeo LeBlanc passed an order-in-council that prevented any aircraft from flying less than 2000 feet over or landing less than one half mile from any seal without government permission. It was aimed directly at the protest action.

The Greenpeaceers were forced to scrap their original plans and venture onto the ice with empty hands to talk with the sealers and to shield pups with their own bodies. Due to the harassment by Fisheries officials, the protest was largely ineffectual in preventing the actual killing.

In the five years of Greenpeace activities the support of the Canadian government has been strictly verbal.

The U.S. government has banned the import of harp seal products. In Canada the seal pelts appear as glove lining and fur trim on coats.

The purchase of a sperm whale tooth in the U.S. warrants a $10,000 fine—the U.S. has banned the importation of whale products. A similar purchase in "the true north strong and free" receives no more than a raised eyebrow.

"The Canadian government is just totally ecologically irresponsible," said Greenpeace President Bob Hunter in a 1975 interview.

Un Quebec Independant?

par David Boisvert

Tous ceux qui ressentent l'amour du pays et qui tiennent à voir les Québécois devenir un peuple libre dans une patrie libérée ne peuvent qu'avoir l'esprit troublé face à la sorte d'interrogation que la victoire péquiste suscite dans les milieux anglophones. Les reportages de la presse et des médias anglophones semblent plus que jamais remettre en question la possibilité de l'indépendance québécoise. C'est en tenant compte de ces circonstances qu'il faut aborder l'analyse de l'élection de lundi dernier et de sa pertinence par rapport au mouvement indépendantiste.

Mon objet n'est toutefois pas de répéter les analyses de l'élection déjà faites par la presse bourgeoise tant du côté francophone qu'anglophone. De telles analyses et les diagnostics qui en découlent ne serviront d'ailleurs qu'à alimenter et affirmer des vues idéologiques qui ne sont pas les miennes et dont la critique s'avère nécessaire.

Il faut dans un premier temps souligner que le mouvement indépendantiste ne peut être conçu en termes statiques, et qu'en autant que les analyses électorales nous obligent de geler le "moment", elles tendent à fausser la réalité qui, dans le cas du mouvement indépendantiste, est plutôt une réalité en évolution constante. Chose plus importante encore, le phénomène indépendantiste est loin d'être un phénomène passager. A l'encontre de partis politiques du genre classique, l'expression politique du mouvement indépendantiste s'appuie sur une prise de conscience nationale et nationaliste qui ne peut être déracinée sans porter atteinte à la nation elle-même.

Si le mouvement indépendantiste est dynamique, et s'il est beaucoup plus qu'un mouvement passager, c'est parce qu'il répond aux rapports de forces déterminant les relations entre classes sociales dans la formation québécoise. Souignons d'abord que ces rapports de forces ont subi des changements de plus en plus accélérés depuis le début du siècle à mesure que le capitalisme anglophone développait les forces productives du pays, et à mesure que l'Etat s'exerça à accommoder ce capital. De cette manière, la population francophone paysanne du Québec fut peu à peu prolétarisée. Ces changements au sein de la formation québécoise ont fait éclater le régime trational qui était marqué par la domination du clergé et de politiciens petit-bourgeois en alliance avec le capital financier, et par une idéologie nationaliste, conservatrice et introspective. Il s'agissait alors de la révolution tranquille, mais tout comme la prise de pouvoir péquiste le 15 novembre, cette révolution qui débuta également à la suite d'une élection, n'était qu'une étape d'un processus historique de plus grande envergure.

C'est dès les toutes premières années de la révolution tranquille que date la naissance du mouvement indépendantiste. A l'origine, mouvement minoritaire à la marge du renouvellement national de l'époque, il devient à courte échéance le symbole même de ce renouvellement et encadre les forces les plus dynamiques de la société québécoise. Les succès vertigineux du mouvement et la lutte de plus en plus ouverte entre "fédéralistes" et indépendantistes fort ressortir les nouveaux rapports sociaux qu'engendrent la révolution tranquille.

Il importe à ce point de signaler que, pour des raisons historiques toutes particulières, le Québec n'a pas connu l'émergence d'une grande bourgeoisie québécoise qui aurait pu masquer l'exploitation capitaliste étrangère du pays. L'évolution de l'économie capitaliste a par contre nécessité la formation de couches sociales moyennes ainsi que d'un prolétariat à majorité francophone qui ressentent vivement l'exploitation et le ressentiment d'autant plus que les lignes d'exploitation suivent les lignes de démarcation linguistique et culturelle.

Mais si le sort de la classe ouvrière québécoise a des parallèles sur le plan mondial, le même est définitivement pas le cas en ce qui regarde les couches moyennes et la nouvelle petite bourgeoisie. Enfin, ces derniers se placent ordinairement dans une position nettement comprador vis-à-vis le capital étranger. Au Québec cependant, elles ont tendance à se rattacher à l'Etat et à promouvoir leurs intérêts de

Chefs-d'oeuvre au Musée des beaux-arts de Montréal:

Du 9 octobre au 14 novembre, le Musée des beaux-arts de Montréal a accueilli un nombre de chefs-d'oeuvre des fameuses collections de l'Ermitage et du Musée russe de Leningrad. Avec l'initiative et l'aide des Musées nationaux du Canada, la participation du ministère des Affaires extérieures, la permission de l'Assemblée nationale de Québec, et l'Assemblée législative du Manitoba, la collection a pu être présentée à la Winnipeg Art Gallery et au Musée des beaux-arts de Montréal. Il faut ajouter que les tableaux étaient déjà sur le continent, à l'occasion des fêtes du bicentenaire des Etats-Unis.

Le Musée d'Etat de l'Ermitage renferme une collection d'art provenant de plusieurs pays et couvrant plusieurs époques artistiques. C'est une des plus remarquables à cause du grand nombre et de la qualité extraordinaire des tableaux. Elle doit sa renommée aux collections personnelles qui sont venues s'ajouter et ainsi, en ont fait un des plus grands musées d'art au monde. Par exemple, une des collections qui a enrichi l'Ermitage est celle de Malmaison, la propriété de l'impératrice Joséphine, première épouse de Napoléon. Et, avec la nationalisation (en 1917) ont augmenté l'envergure du musée.

Le musée russe de Leningrad, le premier musée d'Etat, contient les oeuvres d'artistes russes du 18^e et 19^e siècle et, après la révolution de 1917, a aménagé les collections des palais, des églises, et des demeures de la noblesse pour les mettre à la disposition du peuple. D'après les Soviètes, c'est la plus riche collection nationale d'art de l'Union soviétique.

La classe par le biais du capitalisme d'Etat plutôt que, comme dans le cas du Canada, par une dépendance toujours plus accrue vis-à-vis le capital étranger. La montée du Parti québécois se situe dans cette conjoncture car les succès de ce parti se réalisent dans la mesure où les couches sociales moyennes deviennent de plus en plus conscientes de leurs intérêts de classes. Une fois mise en marche, la formation de ce qu'on peut appeler la conscience de classe qu'exprime le nationalisme de surpassement dont parle Rioux ne sera que difficilement renversée, ce qui d'ailleurs nous porte à conclure que, laissé seul, le mouvement indépendantiste réalisera l'objectif qui lui est le plus cher, c'est-à-dire, l'indépendance du Québec.

Pour éviter des malentendus, il faut clarifier qu'en autant que l'indépendance est condition indispensable pour l'émancipation de la classe ouvrière, elle est à souhaiter pour tous les Québécois. Les contradictions qui existent entre la classe ouvrière et les couches sociales moyennes ne se rapportent point à la question de l'indépendance mais se manifesteront par la suite.

Nous devons préciser cependant que l'indépendance n'est pas seulement d'une importance primordiale pour le Québec mais revêt aussi une importance pour tout le Canada. En dernière analyse, ce qui est en jeu n'est pas simplement la société québécoise et son avenir, mais aussi toutes les Certaines des oeuvres ont vraiment mérité notre admiration. Le Tancrède et Hermione (c.1631) de Poussin, est un de ses premiers tableaux et démontre l'harmonie des couleurs et la sensibilité de l'artiste au début de sa carrière. Claude Gellée, dit le Lorrain, dans son paysage, avec le sujet religieux Le repos pendant la fuite en Egypte (c.1661), a peint la tranquillité pastorale; une campagne riche, où l'homme et la nature sont en harmonie complète. C'est l'idéal, le sublime. Le Rubens de l'exposition, La charette embourbée (c.1618), est typique de l'artiste à ses débuts. De la collection de l'Ermitage, il faut aussi mentionner David et Urie (c.1665) de Rembrandt, Nature morte (c.1899) de Cézanne, la Famille de l'artiste (1911) de Matisse, et la Femme à l'éventail (1908) de Pablo Picasso.

Un des tableaux des chefs-d'oeuvre russes, Vue de Constantinople au clair de lune (1846) d'Avazovsky, est remarquable à cause du détail qui réussit à créer une atmosphère romantique. C'est à la fois réel et idyllique. Le spectateur se sent vraiment dans le port, regardant la mosquée, et les voiliers sous un ciel clair, illuminé par une lune magnifique. Il y a le Portrait d'Ivan Shishkin (1880) de Kramskoy, l'exemple le plus frappant de ce que peut être la réalité dans la peinture, un miroir sur la réalité. Avec une minutie incomparable, Kramskoy peint Shishkin et parvient à immortaliser son physique aussi bien que sa force de caractère.

Le Musée des beaux-arts de Montréal, en plus de sa collection permanente, reçoit au cours de l'année d'autres collections et, vraiment, ça vaut la peine!

structures politiques qui supportent le système économique qui a pendant si longtemps exploité le Québec. Même si l'on présente le Parti Québécois comme un parti "bourgeois", il ne va pas pour ainsi dire que les intérêts de cette "bourgeoisie", s'il s'agit bien d'une bourgeoisie, ne sont pas les mêmes que ceux de la bourgeoisie anglo-canadienne. Rien ne peut non plus contredire le fait que le Parti Québécois affirme le besoin de récupérer les pleins pouvoirs pour l'Etat québécois de donner essor au développement économique ce qui implique, une reconstruction économique, qui s'il ne nuisait pas indéniablement au capital américain, revêtait un caractère tout à fait néfaste pour la bourgeoisie anglo-canadienne. Il ne faut pas oublier que ce sont les politiques du gouvernement fédéral qui depuis plus d'un siècle favorisent cette bourgeoisie comprador, et lui permet une existence indépendante. Il est inconcevable que cette bourgeoisie n'offre aucune résistance à un mouvement qui menace son territoire d'exploitation et ses marchés protégés. Les énoncés du gouvernement fédéral et des partis fédéralistes doivent être vus dans cette optique. Et c'est pourquoi l'on ne peut se permettre d'être optimiste à l'égard de l'indépendance car les forces dont veut disposer cette opposition ne sont point négligeables. Verrons-nous jamais un Québec indépendant? La question, malgré la victoire péquiste, est loin d'être résolue.

Queen's Modern Dance Company

Continuous labour for the love of dance

by Tony Pepper

She shares a small and somewhat inadequate office on the second floor of the Physical Education Centre. But such is the fair of Miss Sandra Aitken, founder, artistic director, choreographer and producer of the Queen's Modern Dance Company. She and her company have always had to deal with intolerable working conditions and shoe-string budgets. None the less, they have never failed to attract capacity audiences for any of their performances. Working under second-rate conditions, it would seem, has become a necessary ingredient for success.

A graduate of Queen's, Miss Aitken inaugurated contemporary dance as an alternative art form here in 1972, during her final year. After a year's study abroad, Miss Aitken returned to Kingston in 1974, and formed the present company of Suzanne Cross, Sarah Dickie, Denise Huyler, Nancy McNaughton and Pam Tate. In that same year, the company produced the colourful and innovative, Cafe de Paris in the old Union pub, The House of Lords. Last year the company moved its talent to the Dance Studio, where they once again displayed the virtuosity, the intelligence and the imagination of their art.

The critical and popular success of the Queen's Modern Dance Company is undoubtedly rooted in Miss Aitken's personal philosophy of dance. For Miss Aitken, "Dance is a continuous creative process. The dancer seeks inspiration in classes and in rehearsals, and, to a certain extent, during performances. An idea may suggest certain moves, or even a style of movement, but finally each movement must be searched out and woven into the fabric of the piece as it evolves. It is a form of sculpture. Michelangelo's David may have come to him in a vision. But then comes the stubborn reality of that block of marble: Flesh can be very stubborn. The creative process must not be allowed, however, to degenerate into something mechanical, like calisthenics, although each movement must be exercised, as well as the muscles".

Miss Aitken is dismayed by contemporary dance's "tendency to overlook the fact that the improvisational technique was developed to free artists from the stultifying effect of too much study". Modern dance, Miss Aitken believes, concentrates too much on established form. But she goes on to say that the dancer needs to be "deeply conversant in the so-called classical style before he can go beyond them". Otherwise, the art is "reduced to simple imitation, which is static".

This year the Queen's Modern Dance Company is presenting seven new works. Each number is based on a different style of movement, and taken together, they illustrate the wide scope of modern tradition. They range from the lyrical to the didactic, expressing either 'esprit de corps' or human suffering and pain.

The evening begins at 8.15. The doors open to a pre-set of the full company doing warm-up exercises. With a flurry of exits, the exercise evolves into the first formal number. To the music of Rod Stuart's Tonight's The Night Miss Aitken composes with her fluid motions the anticipatory emotions of a girl preparing to go out for the evening. There follows a series of dances in both jazz and classical veins both esoteric and sensuous.

All the aforementioned dances are very short. The final piece of the evening, Exodus, is a tour de force. Consisting of five distinct units, each of which depicts a separate chronicle in the persecution of the Jews during the Second World War, it is individually performed by Miss Aitken. Her actions capture the spirit of a people, tormented, caught between the will to live and the desire to die. It is by far the company's most ambitious dance to date.

Queen's Modern Dance Company will be performing Wednesday,

December 1 through Saturday December 4 at 8.30 p.m., and Sunday December 5 at 7.30 p.m. in the dance studio on the second floor of the Physica Education Centre.

Tickets are available in advance from the administrative office of the Phys. Ed. Centre and at the Grey House, as well as at the door. Admission is $2.00.

McArthur production collars Stoppard

by Eric Hughes

The scene opens on the vaguely tawdry, but hospitably furnished parlour of the large but strangely isolated Muldoon Manor. Mrs. Drudge, the maid is cleaning, but what? and why? The eternal questions of life and death, delight and despair, Freud and Jung, Art as imitation of life, je suis ergo sum pass between her mop and her pail. Does she see it? Could she possibly know the important part she is about to play in the mystery about to unfold before our all too suspecting eyes? Do we really care?

If we don't, Moon and Birdboot certainly do. For as drama critics, they must watch and figure out what to say about the performance on stage. Through involvement with the performers on a slightly more than discreet basis, the critics become part of the play. Our fun lies in watching the skill with which Tom Stoppard the playwright accomplishes this crafty denouement and in the way the actors themselves must fall into the pattern.

The McArthur Dramatic Arts production of The Real Inspector Hound is nothing if not fun. Directors, actors, and technical crew have worked together to present a production that is both enjoyable and true to the spirit of Stoppard.

The play has several notable performances. Lorna Mackay as Lady Cynthia, the mistress of Muldoon Manor has command of her character down to the last mannerism. Her every move reeks of melodramatic madness. Ms. Mackay's Lady Cynthia is certainly one of the flakier members of the upper crust.

Andrew Orr as the critic Birdboot uses his impeccable comic timing and a halting delivery to create a disarming portrait of a man whose desires get the best (and the worst) of him.

In the part of Moon, Robert Lackie shone. He has an attractive presence and a good voice and easily wins the audience with his first appearance as a fidgeting theatre goer.

Other pleasant performances were given by Jan Oullahan as Mrs. Drudge, Douglas Feggans as Simon, Gordon Muir as Inspector Hound and especially Susan Ralph as Felicity. She bounces on as nimbly as her tennis ball and her facial expressions are game, set and match!

Unfortunately, Barry Whitehead played Magnus. He was particularly unsuited to the role and did not play with the panache of the rest of the cast. The part required more Lionel Barrymore and less Lawrence Welk.

The Real Inspector Hound is technically a difficult play. Through the use of footlights on the stage and amplified sound, director Larry O'Farrell creates very ably the separation of audience (namely the critics) and stage action—right down to the humourously staged curtain-call.

The McArthur production is enjoyable because it is obvious that the performers are enjoying themselves. If everyone took this attitude to stage work, there would be fewer poor performances and fewer dissatisfied audiences. The Real Inspector Hound should suffer very little from either malady. It plays tonight and tomorrow night at 8.30 in the theatre at McArthur College. The price is $2.00 general admission and $1.00 for students.

What do the words "modern music" mean to you? To many people, they probably mean contemporary rock, folk, or jazz. However, to people who listen to classical music, "modern music" often conjures up images of wild, discordant, arhythmic noise which is an insult to the good name of music. Its apparent disregard for discipline, reason, and tradition is often thought of as being a representative phenomenon of the twentieth century and often leads to condemnation of twentieth-century music as a whole. Anyone making such a blanket condemnation is guilty of forgetting two important points. Firstly, they are forgetting that many of the most popular pieces performed nowadays are by composers of the twentieth century, such as Ralph Vaughan Williams, Dmitri Shostakovich, Aaron Copland and Serge Prokofiev. Secondly, they are forgetting that many great composers of earlier centuries, even Beethoven, were considered as radical in their time as Webern, Varese, and Milhaud have been in this century.

While hopefully freeing some people from a narrowminded rejection of modern music, I must also try to discourage anyone from taking the other extreme and adopting the credo "if it's innovative it must be good". How many people would consider four minutes and thirty seconds of silence to be a creative step in the progression of musical forms? As ridiculous as the question may seem, John Cage, a twentieth-century American composer, in his "Four Minutes Thirty Seconds", requires the performer to sit at a piano for four minutes and thirty seconds, doing absolutely nothing.

We thus arrive at the main point of this article, which is somewhat objective (and short!) examination of "modern music". The three areas that have been explored by modern composers are new musical sounds, new melodic devices, and new rhythmic modes. We'll look at some of the developments in each area and any overlaps that exist between the areas.

As early as the late nineteenth century, non-musical noise was being incorporated into orchestral music, by no less a composer than Richard Strauss. Further down the evolutionary path, we have music as an interpretation of noise, an example of which is Prokofiev's "The Age of Steel". A fusion of the above two developments, with the addition of some interesting electronic "instruments" may be found in the music of Edgard Varese. The rapid advances in electronics just prior to, during, and following World War Two opened a broad horizon to composers searching for new sounds. Some composers took to recombining recorded sounds on magnetic tape. Others, such as Milton Babbitt and Karlheinz Stockhausen, created music for various synthesizers. Yannis Xenakis created "stochastic music", based on the mathematical laws of probability, using computers. Stochastic

Wind Ensemble to feature English music

Duane A. Bates will conduct the fifty-member Queen's Wind Ensemble when they present their first concert of this season in Grant Hall, on Friday, 26 November at 8:30 p.m.

The ensemble, now beginning its eighth consecutive season and founded by Dr. Bates, was the first of the Music Department ensembles to present public concerts when the Bachelor of Music program was introduced at Queen's. Based on the concept of the famous Eastman Wind Ensemble (Frederick Fennell), Queen's Wind Ensemble was formed primarily to perform works which are written originally for winds and percussion.

Friday's program which ranges in time from the sixteenth to the twentieth centuries, and conforms with this concept, opens with Percy Grainger's "Lincolnshire Posy", a series of six English folksongs collected and arranged by the composer, who intended each piece to be a musical portrait. Moving to the twentieth century, "Sound Piece" (for brass and percussion) evidences composer Gardner Read's interest in new instrumental sonorities and techniques. For many, the highlight of the concert may well be the performance of Vaughan Williams "Scherzo alla Marcia" from his Symphony No. 8. Vaughan Williams who composed this symphony in 1955, when he was 85 years of age, scored the Scherzo solely for winds and percussion. It is almost certain that this is the first time any portion of this remarkable symphony has been performed in Kingston. Light classical repertoire is represented by Rossini's Overture "L'italiana in Algerie" (written early in the 19th century) with its gaiety and brilliance, bubbling woodwinds, and of course, the Rossini crescendo. The final two pieces: one by Giovanni Gabrieli, "Sonata Octavi Toni" in which brass instruments play the antiphonal music with its interwoven parts, contrasts of dynamics, space and choirs, contributing to the warm splendour of the music. The last work on the program, "Suite from the Water Music" (said to have been

music is really an area of overlap of all three areas of exploration.

On the melodic side, in the early twentieth century a young composer by the name of Arnold Schoenberg grew tired of emulating the great Romantic composers on a grander and grander scale. He decided to go back to the "basics" and start over, becoming the founder of the Expressionist movement in music. He first experimented with atonality and then developed "song-speech". The further he got into atonality, the more he began to feel that what he was involved in was not pure, free expression, but rather anarchy. Thus he decided to make the advance to the twelve-tone system, invented by his contemporary, Hauer. This system used the chromatic scale as its basis, instead of the conventional major and minor scales. Although Schoenberg himself only used the twelve-tone system in determining sequences or "rows" of notes, his followers Berg and Webern gradually expanded its structural use into rhythm and dynamics, until it reached its logical conclusion in the development of serialism by Pierre Boulez. Serialism is really an area of overlap between the development of new melodic devices and new rhythmic modes.

Another area of melodic development is that of microtones. Haba and Barth wrote music for quarter-tones instead of the conventional half-tones. Harry Partch created a scale with 43 notes to each octave, for which he developed his own instruments. Yet another melodic development was the use of unorthodox harmonies, such as Ives' "tone clusters".

On the rhythmic side, there were two major developments besides those already mentioned as areas of overlap. The first was the use of meters changing from bar to bar, or music with no bars, by Satie, Ives and Stravinsky, to name a few. The other essentially rhythmic device was "aleatoric music", in which the composition depends on chance rather than the elaborate calculations of serialism.

I suppose one additional school of musical thought which includes all or perhaps none of the above three areas of exploration is that of total nonsense, known as Dadaism, of which John Cage is a modern proponent.

No doubt anyone who has survived this article is now wondering "what's all this have to do with CFRC?" Simply this, at CFRC we try, in our Classics programming, to touch all bases, so that our listeners may have an opportunity to enjoy or make their own judgements on music which is unfortunately ignored by many.

Perth County Conspiracy

Don't miss this group

By Liz Wood

It's not easy to write an article about the Perth County Conspiracy. Without trying to, they have acquired a sort of ethereal quality (Remember the ad—"the P.C.C. does not exist"? It's hard to know where to begin, or finish off because one never knows which of the many talented "members" will be appearing. Bearing this in mind, I'll try to give you an idea of who and what to expect when the P.C.C. appears at Bitter Grounds this Saturday night.

It all started out, I think in 1968, as a sort of commune around the Stratford area, and the first band followed soon after. Whoever wanted to, played, although there were presumably some musical prerequisites because they always sounded great, whether there were four of them or twelve of them on stage.

Their music, or rather their presentation, is always of a high calibre. It's folksy and contagious. They are incredibly humorous and musically adept. In recent past years, they have had a member who mimes the songs as they are performed. This may seem an odd idea, but it really works, to the great delight of the audience. I hope mime artist Peter Cheyne shows up at Bitter Grounds.

Terry Jones and David Woodhead are old members of the group now, and both are very talented. They have done music for several television shows - documentaries and features - and they've written some pretty fine stuff for the P.C.C. Percussionist Jerome Jarvis has been around too and along with Woodward and Jones, played on solo albums by Bob Burchill and Cedric Smith, both P.C.C. members.

P.C.C. always puts on a good and very relaxing show. No matter who's on stage, you can be sure you'll have a great evening at Bitter Grounds on Saturday.

OCAA w-polo finals here on Sat.

Gaels hopeful underdogs

by Brian Clarke

There will be no shortage of talent at the Queen's University Swimming Pool Saturday afternoon when the four top university water polo teams in the province meet for the Ontario University Athletic Association Championship.

Defending champion McMaster University Marauders who have won the title for the last seven years will be back in force along with the University of Toronto Blues, University of Western Ontario Mustangs and our own Queen's University Golden Gaels.

Among the players on the four teams will be two former Olympians, one member of the Canadian Junior Team and two members of the Ontario Junior Team.

Queen's qualified for the OCAA finals by placing second in the OCAA Eastern Section behind Toronto. The top two teams in the OCAA Eastern and Western sections at the close of the regular season advance to the championship. In the Western Section, McMaster was first and Western second.

The action begins at 12:30 p.m. when McMaster goes against Queen's. After this game, at 1:30, Toronto will play Western, and then at 3:30 the loser of game one will play the loser of game two for the consolation championship. The final championship between the winning teams of game one and two is slated for 4:30.

The Gaels will be underdogs against the Marauders but a victory by them cannot be completely ruled out. Queen's coach Simon Beitler and his team were awarded the Canadian University Challenge Cup for being the most improved team and showing the most sportsmanship this year.

Highlighting the long list of impressive players who will be playing in the tournament will be 6'7" Paul Petier, a two-time member of Canada's Olympic team, in 1972 and 1976, now playing for McMaster. Weighing approximately 260 pounds

his position is that of roving centre

"He (Petier) made one shot so hard during practice this year at McMaster that it broke the net and the ball," said Gael Graeme Black.

Another past Olympian who will be competing at the finals is Toronto's George Gross Jr. He also saw action for Canada in both of the last two Olympics

Paul Sullivan will be the big name to pay attention to on Western's team. He was a member of the Canadian Junior team.

Queen's also boasts two players who were selected to play for other teams. Mitch Dent and Black, both originally from Ottawa, have been selected to play for this year's Ontario Junior team.

Volleyball undefeated!

by Jill Calder

The Volleyball Gaels played in both a league and an exhibition tournament this past weekend and did very well. Both of the league games played at York University on Friday afternoon were taken by the Queen's squad. The first team encountered was York itself, and they fell quite easily to the precise, precalculated game exhibited by Queen's.

The fine play carried over to the encounter with Windsor which followed. The quick plays and short set strategy of the Windsor team never really got off the ground as the Gaels could do no wrong. The sets put up were near perfection and the resulting spikes frequently hit the Windsor floor without being touched.

So for the league play the Queen's team is to date undefeated. This Saturday they will encounter two more of the opposition - Western, (the national champs) and McMaster, both games to be played here at Queen's. Hopefully the home crowd will spur the girls on to victory over these two strong teams.

The play continued last Saturday with an exhibition tournament including both university and club teams of Ontario. The Queen's team had a slow start after their spectacular play of the evening before, but managed to give some experienced teams a run for their money and to give a few of the newest team members a turn on the floor.

The day was a successful practice session for the Gaels. The coach was very pleased, and was heard to comment after the Windsor match "That was about the best volleyball I have seen from Queen's in about eight years." Needless to say the girls are pleased and look forward to playing this weekend. Come out and watch them win.

MATCH RESULTS

League games: (best 3 of 5): vs York 15-4, 15-1, 12-15, 15-6, vs Windsor 15-10, 15-4, 15-7.

Last Sunday the Queen's Gaels travelled to Wilfred Laurier University for the annual OCAA relay meet. Under the able leadership of coach Lawrence Pike and manager 'Mom', the team men performed to the best of their abilities. Thirteen teams were entered in 11 events.

In the 400 Individual medley relay the 'all-right' Queen's team consisting of cocaptains Tim Dennis, Brian Dalziel and team rowdies Ken Davies and Tes Cassidy, placed a narrow fourth behind Western University. In the 200 free style relay another fourth was taken by Alex Muir, Joe Schmittler, Martin Demmers and Lang Brichford. The final event for the day led to another fourth place by "de boys". Tim, Brian, Ken and Lang in the 400 free style relay. Good races were swum by Jim Wiley and Gerry Bally in the breast stroke, and Jim Baker in the back stroke and free style events.

Win for B.B. gals at York

Anne Sisson Chalk two more up for Queen's Golden Gals Basketball Last Friday saw the Gals handily beat York by a score of 66-38.

Victory was never in doubt and the Gals were able to display their impressive bench strength. Everybody played and played well. High scorers included Eva Stewart, Gail Gunning and Kim Headford. Kim and Eva were also strong on the boards along with rookie Debbie Moore.

The following day the Gals posted their second victory of the weekend, this time out-scoring Windsor 52-45. Queen's fell behind in the first few minutes but soon regained the lead and kept it for the remainder of the game. The Gals experienced some difficulty in penetrating the Windsor zone and their 30 percent shooting average didn't help much either. However, a good defensive effort and 56 percent from the line kept the Gals in the game.

The Gals play their 5th league game this Friday at 6:30 against Toronto hoping to attain a four-and-one record.

Gaels squash all except Yeoman

by Ron Easteal

Last Saturday the men's Squash Team had its first competition of the season. The occasion was the RMC Invitational Tournament. Opposition was supplied by teams from Trent, RMC, York and Guelph.

The Queen's team - Ian Barnett, James McKenzie, Ron Easteal, Adrian Devlin and Jamie Goodall met York in the first leg of the round robin. This proved to be very unfortunate as York and Queen's were the only strong teams entered in the competition. In fact if York had stayed in Toronto, Queen's would have won.

As you may have gathered, Queen's lost 3-2 to York, the lone Queen's winners being Easteal and Goodall. Devlin lost his match after winning the first game 9-0 and leading the record game 7-0. Observers say that he appeared to be overcome with pity for his opposition and insisted on finishing the match left-handed. James McKenzie lost his first match 3-0 to the York Number Two. James' poor performance can partially be blamed on the fact that he spent a lot of time ducking the somewhat erratic swings of his opponent who, by the way, demolished four racquets in the course of the tournaments ($160). The main reason for McKenzie's inauspicious demise was that "he could not find his length" whatever that means.

Ian Barnett must have had a pretty rough night on Friday because he had a very rough day on Saturday. His York opponent was a master of the drop shot and Ian was unable to anticipate well enough to pick up the shots. He made the fatal mistake of not watching his opponent make his shot - a fundamental principle at all levels of squash. His excuse was that the guy was so homely that he "couldn't even look at him even when he was not making his shots."

The highlights of the first round were the wins by Easteal and Goodall. Goodall played so well all afternoon that he only lost one game in four matches - not bad for a rookie. Jamie has a lot of natural talent and once he acquires more court sense he will be a really fine player. Coach Easteal was, in the opinion of this observer, his usual magnificent self. Enough said.

In the following rounds of the round robin, Queen's had little trouble winning all its matches 3-0. With the exception of the number one seed, the opposition was tough. Ian however played well below par and would normally have beaten all but one of his opponents.

One particular opponent was Trent's athletic director and resident layabout, Paul Wilson. This man, who looks like a cross between a tomato and a St. Bernard, is an excellent squash player. He exhibits a full arsenal of shots with both fine touch and tremendous power. This coupled with an experience in placement and court geography, make watching Wilson a pleasure.

The final results of the tournament were that Easteal and Goodall won the trophies of 3rd and 5th seed, McKenzie and Devlin were runners up at 2 and 4, and Ian Barnett came in somewhere at No. 1 seed. Queen's overall could not quite match York's depth and were close runners up.

Next term, the Squash Team will participate in several tournaments and prospects look quite rosy. Queen's will be fortified by two very good players next term. Bob Moffat, once he has recovered from a whole series of automobile accidents will be back and in the top echelons of the team. The other new player will be Nigel Corteloe who has just been pried away from the rugby team. These two will adequately replace coach Easteal who because of an OUAA rule is ineligible for future competition. That rule, by the way, is that no one taking Canada Pension can play for an intercollegiate team.

Bews News: I.A.C. severe action

by Mike Gouinlock

In the wake of recent abuse of officials and the rise in fighting and rough play, the Men's Intramural Athletic Council took some severe action at their monthly meeting last Wednesday. Any person who is ejected from any Bews game for any reason will be suspended for one month from all Bews sports subject to appeal to the Protest and Discipline Committee. Although several members of the Council felt that this action was too severe they also felt that the present punitive action of a one-game suspension was far too light.

None of this action would have been necessary had it not been for the rise in the number of people who blame their own incompetence and ineptitude on officials and more competent teams and players. I personally feel that this action was not necessary and that it reflects the sad state of Bews this year. I only hope that people who feel the need to take the official's job into their own hands will be phased out of Bews by this new rule.

Bills bumble, fumble, and stumble

Buffalo tired of clowning around

by Michael Fitzgibbon

The Ringling Brothers Circus is scheduled to make a stop in Buffalo, New York early next year. However, the cast of clowns had better take note that the people of this city are fed up to their ears with clowns. They have watched their Buffalo Bills bumble, fumble and stumble all season long.

The Bills are a pathetic sight to behold. They have outscored only 2 NFL teams, the hapless TAMPA BAY BUCANEERS and the gumpy-kneed JOE NAMATH and his NEW YORK JETS. The club sits on the bottom notch of the American Conference's East Division with a disastrous 2-9 record. In all probability, the Bills will finish the 1976 campaign with 12 losses, as they face Miami, Detroit and Baltimore in their final 3 games.

The Bills "Rise to Glory" is over and done with. 1973-75 were good years. O. J. Simpson galloped for more than 2,000 yards, Quarterback Joe Ferguson executed brilliant sustained scoring drives and Buffalo battled the Miami Dolphins for the No. 1 position. The team sold out every game in their modern, 80,000 seat Rich Stadium. Today the stadium is usually only one half to three quarters full, as most "fans" stay home and watch Sunday Afternoon at the Movies.

It's difficult to pinpoint what has happened to Buffalo. Many point their fingers at the erroneous defence, others single out trades, injuries and the offence, while some people say that the club has no spirit. If anything, the Bills performance can be characterized by all five areas.

The defence has yielded 233 points in 11 games. My calculations tell me that this is an average of 3 touchdowns per game. The Bills have their own version of Minnesota's famous "PURPLE PEOPLE EATERS" as Tackles EARL EDWARDS, MIKE KADISH, JEFF YEATES, AND DON CROFT spend more time crawling on the green carpet than they do rushing the passer, tackling or throwing off blocks. More often than not, the cornerbacks are caught with their feet tangled up as opposing receivers outsmart them.

Injuries and trades have hurt the team. Joe Ferguson is out for the season with 4 broken transverse processes in his back, while running back Jim Braxton has been out of the lineup since September. Buffalo lost last year's 2 starting Ends (Pat Toomay and Ahmad Rashad) to the expansion cities of Tampa Bay and Seattle. Defensive star WALT PATULSKI is now playing in the red and white uniform of St. Louis. Earlier this season long time Buffalo Place Kicker John Leyboldt kicked himself out of the Bills Jersey after missing crucial field goals. George Jakowenko has since replaced the unemployed Leyboldt.

The OFFENCE has been nothing to write home about. Reserve QB GARY MARANGI has been about as useful as a pair of sunglasses in Kingston. He has tossed the pigskin into the air 158 times, and has found his target only 54 times for a ridiculous 34 percent completion average.

O. J. Simpson hasn't been gliding along like he did in the old days. The "JUICE" who signed a 3 year contract for more than 2 1/2 million dollars the day before the season began, has crossed the goal line only 4 times. The former Heisman Trophy winner should rush for 1,000 yards this season but says "one thing, I think I'm proving a 1,000 yard season isn't all that great." Sometimes he runs better in his Rent-a-Car commercials.

Wide receiver Bob Chandler is having a good year. He has grabbed 49 passes for 667 yards and has scored 8 touchdowns. Punter Marv Bateman is keeping his leg in great shape as he is on the field more than he is off.

The 1976 season has been a bummer for the Bills. They lost coach Lou Saban in Early October, and ex-Green Bay Packer JIM RINGO has been unable to upturn the Buffalo ship. No shows and boos characterize the frustrated, lonely atmosphere at the stadium. "The return of the Juice" hasn't brought Buffalo a winning team, and O. J. is thinking about the Movies again.

There is one positive note circulating in Buffalo, sales of Budweiser, Schlitz and Genesee beer are at an all time high. The fans have had little else to do but drown their sorrows.

Water polo action will take place this weekend as teams compete in the OUAA finals being held on Saturday here at Queen's, 9 p.m. McMaster, U of T, Mustangs and Queen's will be competing for the title of champion. Come out and cheer for Queen's.

to travel miles to get. Volunteers can receive instruction in First Aid and in nursing, enabling them to assist others during an emergency or a disaster. In many schools there is an active Junior Red Cross whose aims are to promote health, serve others and increase international understanding.

The Red Cross offers assistance and aid during a disaster to any country in the world. Their emergency aid includes food, shelter, clothing, medical and inquiry services.

These are just some of the many services offered by the Red Cross. But the Red Cross is not paid for these. Their funds come from their own campaign and from the United Way. By donating to the United Way, we too can help support this worldwide humanitarian organization and make good things happen all over the world.

You are what you eat

Agriculture Minister, Eugene Whelan, is standing by his statements made at a Calgary news conference on the weekend to the effect that heavy consumption of beef makes people ferocious.

Mr. Bert Hargraves, MP from Alberta, asked for an apology to the beef industry unless Mr. Whelan could come up with scientific evidence for his statements. Protests were also heard from other MPs from the western provinces when Mr. Whelan returned to the House of Commons after his trip to Calgary.

Federal probe

The federal government appointed a four-man Royal Commission to investigate public service financial management. The move came after a report by Auditor-General J. J. Macdonnell.

Mr. Macdonnell criticized the move, saying that the Government should not wait for 2 or 3 years to implement his recommendations. He noted that the Government has not even begun to change the way it presents its yearly spending estimates despite 150 recommendations to do people ferocious.

Israel joins UNESCO

The UN Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization admitted Israel unopposed, reversing its former decision. But it also voted by an overwhelming majority to condemn Israel's cultural policies in captured Arab territories, calling them "cultural assimilation."

The anti-Israeli resolution was part of the price demanded by the Arab and Soviet blocs for agreeing to Israel's inclusion in UNESCO. Previously the United States had withheld funds totalling $40 million because of actions against Israel by UNESCO.

The U.S. has also said it considers condemnation of Israel's policies in occupied Arab territories a "conviction without trial" because a UNESCO fact-finding mission has still to visit the area.

11% back separatism

A new opinion survey conducted two days after the Quebec election showed 11 percent of those who answered favoured separatism. The poll was conducted by Maurice Pinard and Richard Hamilton of McGill University whose popular vote forecast based on a poll taken ten days before the election were remarkably close to the actual result. The second poll asked questions of the same people as the first. In the first poll, 18 percent were in favour of separatism.

New OFL leader

Clifford Rilkey defeated incumbent President David Archer Tuesday for the position of President of the Ontario Federation of Labour. Rilkey, a political education director for the United Auto Workers, told a press conference that the Federation will have to be more militant when dealing with the Government. He also said that he plans to travel across Ontario presenting alternatives to Government policies. He also plans to discuss the province's withdrawal from the federal wage control program.

Checking for islands

A Japanese ship from the Maritime Safety Agency of Japan sailed from Tokyo on the weekend to check for underwater volcanoes and the possible emergence of new islands in the Pacific Ocean. Both the United States and Japan are looking for the island or islands, and whichever country finds them first intends to claim them for their own territory.

The question of ownership will be important to the Japanese fishing industry - if the Americans can claim the island(s) they will be able to impose a 200-mile fishing limit which will exclude Japanese boats from the area.

Under international custom the first country to stake a claim and occupy the land possesses territorial rights. But there is really no precedent for a newly formed island.

Ban on fluorocarbons

The Consumer Product Safety Commission in Washington, D.C. was reported to have approved a ban of fluorocarbon propellants in aerosol products. The tentative decision to remove such propellants from the market was based on studies showing that fluorocarbons could cause irreparable damage to the ozone layer in the atmosphere. The ozone layer, which protects the earth from harmful radiation could be broken down by continued use of fluorocarbons.

Prime rates down

Both the Bank of Nova Scotia and the Royal Bank of Canada have cut their prime lending rate by half a percentage point to 9.75 percent. Their drop in interest rates was preceded by the drop in loan rates to chartered banks by the Bank of Canada. As well, they have dropped other interest rates, including interest on mortgages and savings accounts.

Test site

James Snow, minister of transportation and communications, announced last Tuesday that Ontario's $17 million transit test centre will be located in Ernestown Township on Highway 133, north of Millhaven. This centre will cover a 480-acre area and will employ more than one hundred people. For the Kingston area this does not mean that many new jobs will be created, but local engineers and drafters will be able to find some jobs with the centre.

The centre will be used for testing systems and equipment for urban transport. Advanced technology testing will be carried out on a closed-loop, 2,560-metre track with an elevated section over 410 metres. Light rail vehicles will be tested on a 4,800-metre level track. A two-storey building will be built to contain offices, a control tower and laboratories.

Prison industry

Solicitor General Francis Fox is officially starting a new pilot project at Joyceville Institution today. A 40,000 square foot factory is being set up in the prison to produce metal-products on a high-volume commercial scale. Joyceville is the first Canadian penitentiary to set up such a project, and officials hope that two main advantages will be had with this type of work project.

Inmates will earn salaries ranging from $1.25 to $2.65 for each hour of work, whereas at present they earn between $.60 and $1.00 per day working at services and goods production. Inmates will also have an opportunity to work under realistic conditions and in an "outside" setting. Many prisoners feel they will gain valuable experience and training for outside jobs, and for some this will be the first time they have ever held a job.

As few staff will be employed as possible, and prisoners are encouraged to help with the management and to put their own ideas into the project. Various salary levels have been set up, along the lines of usual industry levels. As many inmates as possible will be given a chance at working in the factory, and in lower category jobs the turnover is expected to be around seventy-five percent.

Employees will work seven hours a day, five days a week, and eventually a maximum employment of eighty men should be reached. Although still in the setting-up and training stage, the first contract for 2,000 clothing lockers should be complete by the middle of December. Difficulties which have been encountered have certainly not destroyed a very optimistic mood on the part of all concerned.

Taxi business

Higher taxi fares accorded by the Kingston Police Commission this past April are held to be responsible by many cab owners and drivers for the recent slump in business. The five Greenwood brothers who own Amey's Taxi do not feel that their business is suffering, but City Cab is considering a reduction in rates next April if the decline in business continues. Generally November is a poor month for cab companies and owners, and business picks up with the bad weather.

With increasing overhead and decreasing business owners are finding it difficult to make a profit. Some concerned owners feel that a meter system will have to be introduced in Kingston to keep the business going.

Hotel Dieu Hospital

One of the main recommendations given to the Hotel Dieu Hospital by the Canadian Council on Hospital Accreditation in a recent report is the advisability of accepting continued surgical services from Kingston General Hospital until such time as its present operating rooms are replaced or renovated. Difficulties in the operating rooms arise from poor control of traffic and air flow and from maintenance problems.

Hotel Dieu Hospital plans to open eight to ten new operating theatres in a new eight-storey wing where the Jeanne Mance building now stands. The council commended the nursing care and the good service provided by the dietary staff.

Odds and Ends

The tallest Santa Claus in the world has set up quarters in the CN Tower in Toronto, and much ingenuity is required to whisper wishes in the ear of the 15 foot tall Santa.

A new TV system is here. It beams the picture and sound on to a screen and the resulting image is three feet, nine inches by five feet, about eight times as big as that of an average set.

An American sociologist has concluded from a recent survey that couples who have not lived together before marriage are likely to have happier marriages than those who have. One reason for this, the researcher concluded, is that marriage loses its romance and mystery when the couple has already lived together.

College, university tuition up $75, $100 respectively

Giles Gherson

For the first time in five years, tuition fees for Ontario's institutions of post-secondary education were increased. Dr. Parrot announced that tuition fees for 1977-78 are to rise by $100 for university students and $75 for those attending community colleges.

According to Dr. Parrot this represents an annual average increase over five years of 3.2 percent and 5.4 percent for universities and colleges respectively. He compared this to an average annual increase in the consumer price index of 8.1 percent. Therefore, whereas this year university students financed 14.4 percent of their educational costs, down from 17 percent in 1972, the corresponding figure for next year is 16.1 percent.

That the government should aim for a situation in which the student would pay "roughly 20 percent" of the costs of his education, is "arbitrary", according to Jamie Avis, AMS President. Mr. Avis expressed the hope that the government would provide some substantial justification for desiring to hold the student fee percentage at a given level.

In his statement to the legislature Dr. Parrot served notice that the government will increase the budget for the Ontario Student Assistance Plan (OSAP) for $61 million to $74 million although the loan ceiling will remain at the present level of $1000. This will assure that those presently receiving grants will not suffer from the tuition fee raise.

Although Jamie Avis considered the increased OSAP allocation as a partially redeeming element in the Minister's proposals, Hugh Christie, External Affairs Commissioner, had reservations. He forecast that this year the Ontario government would underspend the OSAP allocation by $7 million, thus raising the possibility that much of the increase in next year's OSAP budget might not in fact be used for its intended purpose. He also suspects that the government will contrive to raise the standards for eligibility to receive OSAP.

Dr. Parrot justified the increase in tuition fees by pointing to the "increased costs faced by universities and colleges." Next year the Ontario government is to augment its current provision of $651 million for university operating grants by $52 million as advised by the Ontario Council on University Affairs. Kathy Wood, AMS Vice President (University Affairs) has calculated that because the government has agreed to give the universities 10 percent more funding, whereas their budget allocation will increase by about 8 percent, the difference (2 percent) will be paid by students.

Student council presidents will meet with Dr. Parrot on December 20 to discuss reaction to the fee increase. According to Mr. Christie, student presidents will express their "resolute hope that this tuition fee increase does not develop into a trend," for as Mr. Avis said such an

Foreign students: duty for Canada

by Paul Finkel

The necessity for increased flexibility in enrollment patterns, and the maintaining of "quality graduate study and research" and "interprovincial student mobility," were two recommendations made at the annual meeting of the Association of University and Colleges of Canada. A report of this year's meeting which held as its theme, "The changing conditions within the Universities," was presented to members of the Senate last Thursday.

Continuation of educational aid to less developed countries was cited as a "duty for Canadian Universities" and strong opposition was expressed regarding differential fees for visa students. It was felt that differential fees were not a fair method of regulating the number of foreign students enrolled in Universities and that the adoption of such a policy could lead to proposals to implement increases in fees for students from outside of the province. It was recommended that the AUCC express its concern to the government "over actions tending to limit numbers of foreign visa students" which are not preceded by "rigorous investigation of the current situation."

Another area which did not receive much support was "student evaluation of teaching ability," and it was felt that "Universities must decide and state to what extent evaluation of teaching is geared to merit-pay or to improvement of performance." Also noted was that "research findings on teaching methods offer prospects of more sophisticated evaluation techniques but no simple answer."

An event of special interest to Queen's was the election of Principal Watts to the AUCC Board of Directors.

The Canadian identity

As a political entity, Canada is thought to be perilously close to dissolution following the election of an avowedly separatist government in Quebec. A wave of press reaction has followed the vote. The Toronto Star ran an unprecedented front page editorial last Saturday which maintained that Canada is "sleep-walking toward disaster", and our national leaders are not about to "wake us up". The Star advocated broad changes in government including increased provincial autonomy and a "Save Canada" cabinet composed of capable Canadians of all political persuasions. Citizens and politicians, they feel, have displayed an inappropriate lack of concern over the recent PQ victory and its ramifications.

Clearly, though, we should proceed with cautious determination. What seems most needed is a clear, practical and mutually acceptable definition of what this country is. One nation comprised of principally two nationalities is Pierre Trudeau's definition of our society. Canada is a composite of several diverse cultures and our resulting distinctiveness is well protected from too much American influence by a different and more conservative political structure.

Our nation, built on respect for two predominant nationalities as well as other less visible ones, is committed to the autonomy and continued development of all. Common to everyone is a land mass and a federalist system of government as well as a tradition of parliamentary government.

Our economic system is instrumental in the preservation and development of our multicultural community. The preservation of the artistic and linguistic elements of the French culture, for example, is expensive. It requires a united Canada and her domestic and foreign trading markets—a separate Quebec is more likely to succumb to the American monolith.

Confederation was a response to the great threat against the economic and political survival of certain provinces. It was, as many have maintained, a marriage of convenience. While there is no doubt that a marriage of convenience is more prone to dissolution than one based on love, there is good reason to believe that the original criteria for confederation still hold true today. Moreover, 109 years of close association have given rise to a certain national consciousness and identity, albeit difficult to articulate, to which we nonetheless relate.

One important aspect of this identity has been our political structure which has striven to maintain a vague unity in a diverse society. It is, as Mr. Trudeau put it, an undertaking "well advanced on the road to liberty" because within Canada different peoples are able to seek personal fulfillment in as broad or as narrow a context as they desire. The very existence of Canada has exemplified the ideal of the brotherhood of man and its preservation has always depended on mutual respect and love.

In the months ahead all those who value the Canadian ideal, which is the spirit of brotherhood and community rather than parochial xenophobia, must cast aside the temptation to succumb to the defeatist arguments of those who find the challenge of this ideal too taxing. It is far easier to attack than to build but it is considerably less profitable. All Canadians must devote themselves to a careful consideration and understanding of what Canadian identity signifies. Only when we are sure of the answer can we have any hope of preserving this nation.

Please call the police

The recent cases of breaking and entering, theft and attempted rape in the Queen's student housing area is a distressing situation, to say the least. Five instances of crime have occurred in the last two weeks in various student homes on Earl, Barrie, University and Johnson Streets. These instances do not speak well of the living environment faced by students in Kingston.

Fear and apathy has contributed to the recent crime increase. It is too often the case that neighbours ignore the crime going on around them because they don't want to get involved. While three drunken Queen's students hurled a concrete block through the windows of another student on Earl St., several bystanders hurried past and said nothing, not even caring enough to call the police. Such chosen uninvolvedness only allows for further violence to develop.

We would urge you, if you see anything suspicious, anything amiss, any unfamiliar individuals loitering in the neighbourhood, phone the police and describe for them the circumstances. The police will appreciate your concern and will respond to the call. Being cautious is not paranoid, it is in the best interests of all of us.

Someday you may find that a thief has helped himself to your stereo albums while your neighbours stood by uninvolved.

"Action Campaign" organized to fight high 3rd world student fees

OTTAWA (CUP)—An action campaign to oppose differential fees for third world students, give Canadians the facts about those students and streamline policies for admission to the country and the education system was adopted by delegates attending a Third World Students in Canada conference here Nov. 19-21.

The core of the campaign rests on the formation of a committee to "undertake a wide and in-depth public education campaign on the various aspects of Third World students in Canada."

Delegates said Ontario was allowed to impose differential fees on international students and Alberta to propose them without much public or institutional protest because of a lack of information.

The committee will call on third world organizations in Canada, academic and church groups as well as labor, students and politicians to inform Canadians. Other than holding nation-wide press conferences, exact strategy for circulating the facts about international students in Canada were vague.

Canadian Bureau for International Development executive director J. Alan Rix emphasized the need to move quickly saying, "This is not a long battle...we'll know by March if we've been successful."

The conference urged provincial and federal governments to wait for information studies from WUSC-CBIE before deciding policy affecting international students. And when policy is discussed, post-secondary institutions, the National Union of Students and the provincial student organizations plus academic associations should be consulted.

Delegates agreed unanimously to fight differential fees for third world students, urging Ontario colleges and universities to reject them and calling for an investigation of their constitutionality. But they did not agree the two-tier fee system should be abolished for all out of country students.

Some said those from wealthy nations should pay more.

As a result the inclusion of all international students was rejected in a motion recommending third worlders be given special consideration for admission to post-secondary education without financial guarantees, provided part-time jobs, free accommodation or other compensating factors are present.

While the conference did not address international student quotas in its plenary they were alluded to in a motion opposing any policy that "restricts the free flow of students into and across Canada."

Resolutions demanding eased employment restrictions on third world students and better campus services were also passed by more than 100 delegates attending the joint conference of World University Services Canada and the Canadian Bureau for International Education (WUSC-CBIE).

Senate
notes:

Italian to be offered as medial next year

by Paul Finkle

The proposal for the implementation of a medial concentration in Italian which was referred to the Senate Committee on Academic Development last month has been approved by Senate and will commence next year. This will involve the creation of two new courses in Italian one of which (49-430) will alternate with a pair of half courses already being taught (49-300* and 49-301*). The other new course (49-500) will be a reading course, to be available for use if needed.

Referred to the Senate Committee on Scholarships and Student Aid for consideration, were The Peter Kiewit Sons Company Award in Hydraulic Engineering and The Peter Kiewit Sons Company Bursary in Civil Engineering. The former, consisting of an Honorarium of $100 and a bronze medal, will be awarded to a graduating student in Civil Engineering and the latter, worth a value of $1,000.00 will be given to a final year student of the same Applied Science Program.

Recommendations that both the operations of both the Centre for Resource Studies and the Institute of Local Government be extended for a period of five years were also referred to the Senate Committee on Academic Development, for final approval by Senate at the December meeting.

Visiting historian preaches on Protestantism

by Paul Henderson

Canadian historiography up to 1914 was influenced by the changes in Ontario Protestantism in the nineteenth century. So says Dr. William De Villiers-Westfall of York University. In a talk delivered last Wednesday evening in Watson Hall Dr. Westfall contended that a new Protestantism developed in the 1840's in reaction to the increasing secularization of society. Moreover, this reaction established an unusual bond between the Anglicans and the Dissenters, in particular the Methodists, as they initiated a crusade against the corrupting forces of materialism.

Furthermore, Dr. Westfall pointed out that Protestant theology had been inculcated with the "millenarianism" prevalent during the mid-century, and that this greatly altered the conception of time, with particular reference to the future and progress. Protestants, the York professor continued, distinguished between the secular and the religious world. For the common man there was no progress in the secular sphere, longing as he did for the golden days of the millenarianism, however, conceived of progress as a moral evolution, from sin to redemption through various stages. The secular world was declining but religiously, Christ was about to return and usher in the millenium.

From here, Dr. Westfall showed the relationship between form and content when he stated that this religious interpretation of progress was then imposed upon the non-religious world, namely Canadian historiography. Religious in form but secular in content, progress for the Canadian historian during the late nineteenth century was defined in terms of Canada's political development, from the wilderness to self-government. Dr. Westfall further observed that every Canadian history text up to 1914 devoted its last chapter to Canada's future. Essentially, it was stated that Canada's millenium was imminent, at which time the nation would take its place among the world leaders. It was indeed an epic and romantic history, but as Dr. Westfall concluded, to be dashed upon the battlefields of the First World War.

Library committee seeks

by Annette Nicholson

The Senate Library Committee passed several recommendations last Tuesday night to be presented to the Vice Principal's Library Committee for consideration.

The purpose of the recommendations is to restructure the senate committee to give it continuity and to make it stronger in long-term planning, explained Dr. Swainson, Chairman. Provision for the establishment of sub-committees was recommended in order to better air library user concerns, he said.

It was recommended that a secretary of services to the Committee be provided by the Senate Office. The result of this, if passed, would be that the current secretary, Chief Librarian Dr. Redmond, would no longer be a voting member of the Committee. Since the meetings are open, he would, however, be available for advice and assistance to the committee.

Waterloo exec. member arrested

WATERLOO [CUP]—A University of Waterloo students federation executive member Franz Klingender was apprehended in a rock-throwing incident late November 21, in which a window was shattered in the office of the Chevron, the student newspaper the federation suspended from publishing two months ago.

Campus security reported he would be charged at Waterloo Regional Police Court November 24. The nature of the charges was not specified.

Guelph anti-NSU vote contested

GUELPH [CUP]—The student president at the University of Guelph is contesting the results of a referendum in which students voted by a large majority to reject membership in the National Union of Students (NUS).

U of G Central Students' Association (UGCSA) president Peter Meisenheimer accused the leaders of an anti-NUS campaign of electoral irregularities during the referendum November 17-19, in which students voted 2200 to 400 against NUS membership.

Meisenheimer and other UGCSA councillors are calling for a new referendum in light of activities by an anti-NUS "committee for concern" violating voting procedures including: covering pro-NUS wall posters with anti-NUS posters; affixing "Vote No" stickers to several ballot boxes; and distributing anti-NUS literature after polling began.

Meanwhile a referendum to join NUS also failed at the University of British Columbia after students voted about 58 per cent in favour of NUS Membership. A two-thirds majority was required according to the students' union constitution.

Carleton opposes differential fees

OTTAWA [CUP]—The number of international students in Canada is "not sufficiently disturbing" to warrant differential fees or quotas for those attending post-secondary institutions, according to the president of Carleton University, Dr. Michael Oliver.

Differential fees is one of the worst ways of applying a policy of some restraint, said Oliver at a workshop at the joint conference of World University Services Canada and the Canadian Bureau for International Education (WUSC-CBIE) in Ottawa November 19-21.

The Carleton president and member of a CBIE task force on Third World students said the increasing visibility of international students has sparked an "emotional reaction" from the public.

Canadians are not used "to people who look differently and talk differently" and are frightened by those "whose race may be perceived as a threat."

Oliver said the costs of university would remain the same without international students and that government should "balance the costs with the benefits" of visa students participating in Canada's educational community.

Laurentian takes same stand

OTTAWA [CUP]—Laurentian University Senate received unanimous support for its stand against differential fees from delegates attending a Third World Students in Canada Conference here November 19-21.

On October 21 the senate voted against levying differential fees on international graduate students. However the move affected only five students. The move has yet to be approved by the Board of Governors. The Senate also extended its position against the two-tier system to include about 50 undergraduate students. The student council and the International Students Organization mounted a lobby to pressure the Senate into this position.

The tripling of fees for international students applies to all first year visa students except those funded through the Canadian International Development Agency.

Lab specimens

Fearful?

by Patti Ann Trainor

Many students who take or wish to take laboratory courses are squeamish about handling small, dead laboratory animal specimens. The lab student who has this fear often suffers in his marks because he cannot perform the necessary dissections, not because of any lack of skill but because of his unwillingness to handle the specimen. People who wish to take lab courses which involve the handling of such specimens but do not simply because of their anxiety about touching these creatures, lose out due to a phobia which can be overcome.

Such is the viewpoint of Merv Gilbert, a graduate student from the Department of Psychology at Queen's. Mr. Gilbert will be offering a course to help people afflicted by this problem to overcome their anxiety and thus improve their performance in the laboratory. The course will commence in January and will consist of a total of two hours divided into four weekly sessions.

Mr. Gilbert emphasized that the course, which is being offered as a free service, is open to any Queen's students and that those who are interested in participating should contact himself at 549-0380 or Mrs. Margaret Innes at 547-5915.

He also stated that any personal information attained during the course will be kept strictly confidential.

Present ald., student, French seeks 2nd term

by Rob Reynolds

Incumbent alderman Terry French is running, once again for election in Sydenham Ward. Apart from representing his constituents, Mr. French is involved in the activities of the major institutional component of his ward, Queen's University.

At present Terry French is a part-time student at Queen's, being enrolled in Sociology 122. His student status is somewhat unusual as he sits on the University Board of Trustees, the body which controls the finances and direction of Queen's.

When questioned as to whether relations were deteriorating between Queen's students living off campus and permanent residents of Kingston, Mr. French answered that he had, "never heard criticisms that students are overrunning the neighbourhoods." He later went on to say that

Queen's was "the biggest business that Kingston has."

Mr. French, in discussing how Kingston City Council interacted with Queen's, cited a recent piece of legislation which would directly affect students living off-campus. The legislation deals with landlords having to keep the temperature in their lodgings at 70 degrees from Sept. 15 to June 1. In his role as member of the Transportation Committee and Vice-Chairman of the Public Works Committee, Mr. French has stressed the importance of local services, most notably garbage collection and street lighting.

In terms of Kingston's future Mr. French sees redistribution of the tax base as a major consideration. According to Mr. French, "the industrial contribution should increase." To achieve this end Mr. French cites the necessity of encouraging new industries to establish in Kingston

Mr. French is president of the radio station CKLC and is a native Kingstonian. Although he was brought up in the ward that he now represents, Mr. French presently resides in Rideau ward.

Although Mr. French sits as alderman he was not elected but appointed to the position after Keith Norton resigned in order to run for MPP. Mr. French came third in the ward in the 1974 municipal election, thus joining Lois Miller as representatives of Sydenham ward.

Oxfam Development Week:

Kingston sets target to support self-help approach

'Oxfam Development Week' in Kingston from November 22 to 27, aimed at recognizing the work that Oxfam Canada has done in promoting long-term development among people in underdeveloped countries.

One of the major events of the week was a lecture on Monday, Wednesday and Friday by Judith Marshall, Oxfam's Programme Development Coordinator for Southern Africa. Ms. Marshall recently returned from a seven week visit to Mozambique where she observed the situation of Zimbabwe refugees.

Oxfam Canada is an international development agency founded in 1963. It emphasizes a self-help approach to development by supporting community based projects in education, health care, agriculture, and local industry.

Oxfam Development Week occurred in the midst of the annual fundraising drive. According to Ken Fletcher, chairman of the Kingston Oxfam Committee, the national target is $1.5 million, and he hopes to raise about $25,000 from the people of Kingston. "The $25,000 target is a modest one," Fletcher said, "when we measure our standard of living in Kingston against the needs of those less fortunate."

Orientation film endorsed

The Queen's administration has commissioned Mike MacMillan and Yan Moore, film students, to make an orientation film about Queen's for the purpose of showing it to provincial high schools. They have been provided with $7,700 for the film.

MacMillan, who produced The Academic Cloister, a provocative film designed to force a new look at university life, said his new film would be more objective. "It is not a propaganda film, it won't whitewash the problems, but it also won't force people to think about issues, like the Academic Cloister did," he said.

The focus of the film, according to MacMillan, would be to show the pros and cons of attending university. Dean Sinclair said the film would improve high school liaison.

Auditor-General liven's Canadian political scene

by Brian Greene

This past week or so has been a particularly active one on the Canadian political scene. Of particular interest was the most recent Auditor-General's report.

As was expected, the audit was tantamount to a declaration of open season on an already beleaguered government. The revelations of incompetence, extravagance, and financial boondoggles were hardly surprising; we've come to accept that sort of performance from Ottawa. Everyone suspected that government spending was wildly out of control, anyway. But Mr. Macdonell's criticism of "carte blanche" funding by the AECL for hired sales agents abroad has seen that organization accused not only of sloppy accounting procedure, but of overseas influence-peddling as well. And it prompted Mr. Macdonell's predecessor—the infamous Maxwell Henderson—to make public a confidential letter he had sent the Prime Minister concerning questionable business practices by the then government-owned Polysar Corporation. He alleged that volume-order rebate payments may have been used to camouflage kick-backs, that inflated receipts were made out to favoured customers to help them evade taxes in their own countries. According to Mr. Henderson, he was reluctant to reveal this at the time because it may have embarrassed Canada before the world, implicating the government as an accomplice in a clearly illegal act. Indeed, it seemed as if Canada had discovered its very own "Lockheed scandal," and the self-righteous political opportunists along with our notoriously sanctimonious press chorused in unison their shock and disapproval.

In my opinion, it was a pretty tawdry way of gaining cheap political points. Can Canadians be so naive or so smugly certain of our own moral superiority that we are blind to the conduct of business beyond our borders? Greased palms, bribery, kick-backs, considerations—however bluntly or conspiratorially you'd like to phrase it—what we may regard as scandalous is regarded as standard elsewhere, resignedly accepted as just another cost of doing business. And in point of fact, there is nothing strictly illegal about overseas pay-offs in Canadian law.

If Canadians really hope to compete overseas, and if government-run corporations really are in business to turn a profit—and that's what hypocritical members of the opposition usually demand—they are going to have to remain competitive. And remaining competitive means getting our hands dirty sometimes, indulging in some unsavoury practices because that's just the way the great big world out there operates.

I can't see our moral crusade accomplishing any good. In fact, all it can do is severely handicap any efforts in the future on the part of Canadian enterprises to break into international markets. Concern about this sort of publicity is going to prompt a lot of people to stay clear of Canadian contacts entirely. Where bribery in high places is a way of life, the subtleties and gracious euphemisms of this sort of transaction are implicitly understood and accepted. In airing our dirty laundry in public, Canada's sin has been the unforgivable one of tactlessness.

The reaction of the Argentinian press, in contrast with our own, is particularly illuminating. Apparently, only one of five major dailies in Buenos Aires bothered to carry the story (off the press services, by the way) of an alleged 5 million dollar pay-off by Canada and her Italian partners in the selling of a CANDU reactor there. But no one evinced shock or undue concern. It happened, after all, before the latest military junta had installed itself at the head of state, and everyone knows that the old Peronist regime was riddled with corruption. Anyway, it was just another example of the bumbling ineptitude of Argentina's civil service: the Koreans apparently got away with three million dollars more!

Truly there is no exit

Dear Editor:

Scott Haig's and Jennifer Warren's report about my talk in the 'Last Lecture' series mentions only Sartre's approach to "Man is condemned to freedom". I thought I had also conveyed to my audience the limitations of this approach. Consequently, I stressed the need to expand our knowledge and awareness of the world around us as well as of our inner space in order to gain more freedom from both.

Cooling the press war

by Trish Crowe

A usually friendly rivalry has existed among the various student newspapers at Queen's from time immemorial. The Journal and Golden Words have fought, through the presses, on almost every topic currently up for discussion. This is how it should be within a student community - competition for reader and writer loyalty by catering to differing viewpoints.

Lately, however, this competition seems to have become a more heated, and for some, a less friendly one. This would eventually result in an interesting situation if ever it was to be carried to the fore. I can visualize it now - the Journal taking tips from the Playboy Adviser in order to obtain that portion of the community who enjoy such humour, and Golden Words holding the presses until the last possible moment, in order to get the scoop on some major earth (or campus) shattering news story.

Silly, isn't it?

And lately, the Lictor has expanded from the strictly political scene to cover events of interest to a wider ranging audience. Just one more 'competitor' in the market for readers?

One of the most important elements that is generally ignored in this 'paper war' is the fact that each of these newspapers has a definite role to play on campus. Instead of trying to outdo each other, they should be playing up these differences to the fullest, taking into account the audience each is catering to. It is a valid argument that in order to attract a larger audience, changes must be made, but these changes must not be so radical as to totally eliminate the attractive character, style and individuality of each paper.

The Journal has changed and expanded its format greatly this year, to the extent that it is debatable whether it is a newspaper, or a news magazine, or a forum for opinion and debate. In respect to this, the Lictor has also grown from being a medium through which only politically minded people could express their views, to one which includes news commentaries of a sort. And to top it off, Golden Words is making a concerted effort to 'clean up' its image. When will it all end?

But the fact remains that certain groups will only read certain newspapers, depending on their interests and expectations. This will not change greatly with changes in the format and policy of each of the three papers - people may well be turned off by these changes, having found something that they enjoy reading, but I guess you can't please all of the people all of the time, right?

At any rate, I enjoy all of the student publications currently on campus. What a non-partisan (wishy-washy, perhaps?) attitude, eh? Just the same, it's true. The people involved in the production of the Journal, the Lictor and last but certainly not least, Golden Words are all really 'neat' - so let's just hope that the minor battle currently being waged doesn't change this neatness to bitterness.

A Voice From the Cloister

Do today's universities really need degrees?

Margaret Churche &

Carol Town, Queen's Senators

"Of course you can't eliminate the degree and grading system. After all, that's what we're here for." This comment was made by a student in Pirsi's famous Zen and the Art of Motorcycle Maintenance (p. 189) but it could just as easily have come from a student at Queen's or any other university campus. What has happened to post-secondary education such that its objective, at least in the minds of students, has changed from "higher learning", from developing the critical thought processes necessary to society to being just a grade and degree mill?

As we mentioned in our last two columns, we feel that the lecture system and the strong competition among students for high marks have had a lot to do with the present attitude of students towards their university education. The question which must then be asked is how can this situation be remedied? One possible way might be through the introduction of a pass, fail, honours scheme such as presently exists within the Faculty of Medicine. The merit of such a system is that most work done by a student would receive a passing grade but that only truly original and critical work would be accorded an honours grade. Hopefully such a system would encourage students to produce high quality work since anything less than that would be accorded just a passing grade. The problem with the pass, fail, honours system is that it is still based on a grade system of sorts but it is worthwhile in the sense that it only gives recognition to the very best work that the student is capable of doing. The system still does not solve the problem of the mediocre student who just wishes to pass. However, the reality of university is that there will always be such individuals around as long as a university degree confers some sort of status or helps to get a job. The student who only does enough work to pass is obviously not benefitting from his university education per se although he may be benefitting from meeting people, doing activities on campus, etc. It seems very unfortunate however that so many tax dollars should be spent on such an individual as well as sad that such a person should be wasting time at university which might be spent more profitably elsewhere.

Another possible solution would be to do away with grades and degrees entirely. As far as the professional schools are concerned, outside bodies test the competence of the graduates and thus protect the public. As for undergraduate work, its main aim should be to get the student to enjoy the learning process and to pursue certain areas in depth. With the guidance of professors, students would thus be encouraged to master information required as a basis for further study as well as to become interested in certain aspects of each subject just because they happen to be interested in them. We already have the basis for such an approach in the independent study programmes open to fourth year students in the Faculty of Arts and Science. However, many more, if not all, students in third and fourth years should be encouraged to take such programmes.

Two of the main objectives we feel would be raised to any gradeless-degreeless university would be: (1) how to determine who gets into professional faculties, and (2) how to ensure the quality of the university's offerings. To begin with the second objection first, this would be no problem if all students worked to the best of their abilities in the areas in which they were most interested. Any students not doing so should be encouraged to leave. The present system of grades is no guarantee of quality at least with respect to the graduate who just barely manages to chalk up enough passing grades to get a degree. Neither is quality ensured by an ability to regurgitate a lot of material on an exam and hence get an A grade.

As for the first objection, it is indeed a much more difficult one to resolve. One possible solution would be by using a lottery system whereby all qualified applicants (qualified in the sense of having completed a certain number of years of university or certain courses and after some sort of screening process) would have an equal chance of being selected for the places available. The problem of defining "qualified applicants" is the real stumbling block here and must depend on the particular faculty's feelings towards the importance of motivation, references from professors, personal qualities, etc.

In conclusion, then, the present system of grades and degrees deters the real process of learning. If universities are to develop critical thought they must stress learning per se rather than grades and degrees.

Christmas gifts needed!

This is written in the hope that you will consider participating in an upcoming project called "Spreading the Christmas Spirit". There will be a Christmas tree placed in the Polson Room of the Student Union and everyone in the University community, students, faculty and staff will be encouraged to donate gifts and holiday food for those families in Kingston that would otherwise not be able to have them. The Salvation Army ultimately will pick everything up and take full responsibility for distribution to those who will most benefit.

There are very few of us who could not afford to pick up a small gift for a child who would otherwise have very little to look forward to Christmas morning. Even the donation of food could add something special to a family's dinner on Christmas Day and would only mean you choosing something extra the next time you are food shopping.

This project has tremendous potential for success. Please seriously consider how every little effort it would take to add to the happiness of a child or family on December 25. The "Spreading of the Christmas Spirit" tree will be available for your contribution during the Information Bank hours in the Polson Room beginning on Monday, December 6.

Why women are playing hockey -- for the fun

Dear Editor:

After reading an article in the sports section of the Globe and Mail entitled "Intercollegiate Hockey, a Fast Growing Sport Among Women" (Nov. 8, 1976), I decided that a comment from the "inside" was necessary.

A quick glance at the article provides the reader with an engaging human interest story on that strange breed of women who enjoy playing hockey!

One would think that after two years of intercollegiate hockey, I would be used to the kind of comments made in that article, and to a large extent, that is true. However, this comment is for the other women who enjoy the excitement of playing hockey and who have not yet been fully able to understand why their activity strikes others as strange. Perhaps even more, this is for those like to don their skates and grab a stick but who refrain because of "what people would think".

The above mentioned article contained several inferences to the supposed incompatibility of women and hockey. "Small delicate shoulders. Smooth pretty faces" is just one example. The statement seemed to be intended to shock the reader by revealing that not all female hockey players are overgrown back-alley bullies. Surprise! All kinds of women can and do play hockey! Secondly, after making this startling revelation, the writer chose 5'8", 150 pound Lois Cole of McMaster as the subject of closer scrutiny. For those of us who know or have played against Lo-lo, the reason for this choice is obvious - she's one of the best players in the league. I recall at least one year in which she was the league's top scorer. By making this choice however, the writer allows the reader to draw his own conclusions about what it takes to be a good female hockey player. If the purpose of the article was to draw attention to widespread interest in women's hockey, it might have been better to pick other female hockey players from a wide spectrum of backgrounds and of as many shapes and sizes as possible. This would have shattered many of the more traditional myths surrounding women's hockey. I can think of quite a number of players who would be worthy of a column inch or two.

I was further bothered by the inference in the article that if the female hockey player wasn't a "pro", she might be "better off in the kitchen". Is that our only option? Can't we play just for the fun of it?

A strange irony struck me while reading the descriptions of the wide variety of skills possessed by female hockey players. The writer drew the similarity to a "peewee hockey team" but failed to see why that similarity is in a few cases, quite apt. First of all, there is very little encouragement, in fact most times active discouragement of female hockey players. In fact, it has only been in the last few years that any kind of minor hockey network for women has developed. It still lags far behind that for young men. Even yet, there is still something "wrong" with women who have a hankering for hockey. I talked to a cabbie in Toronto last weekend who told me of the funny looks he gets when he mentioned that he is the coach of a girls' hockey team. I suppose he knew that I could identify with that.

If the Globe reporter had really wanted to talk about the evolution of women's hockey, at least some passing reference to improving quality should have been made. One only needs to have watched the rapidly climbing quality of play to see that women's hockey is coming out of the "minor league". Like many others, my only childhood experience with hockey was shinny on a frozen pond with a bunch of the guys. Until I reached university, organized hockey was out of reach. Not so for my brothers. I started playing intercollegiate hockey three years ago just before the rapid increase in women's hockey had hit the university scene. If I had tried to make this year's Queen's team with the same skill level I then possessed, I wouldn't have made it past the first cut! There are just so many prospective players entering university now who have had minor hockey experience - they knew what to do with a stick, and the puck!

To do with a stick, and the puck! The Globe article was the question why would any girl want to play competitive hockey? Why on earth not? It holds just as much excitement for us as it does for the guys. In fact, it may be that women have a better outlook on the sport than a lot of men do. We play it because we enjoy it - those of us playing now certainly have no professional career in the sport to look forward to! We certainly don't play for money - there are no contracts, bonuses for goals or scholarships. We don't play for the thrill (?) of pounding the tar out of the opposition. I've never seen a light in women's intercollegiate hockey. We're too busy playing the game.

Changes in the line-up patrol

Dear Editor,

Since the writing of my letter published in last Friday's Journal I have been informed of a change in policy.

The pub manager and the chief constable have decided to place two constables on the line-up instead of one and they are to remain outside from seven o'clock to nine o'clock. This means only three constables will be inside from eight to nine, and because of this it may take longer to seat the people waiting in line.

It is hoped this change will be effective in controlling the line but the students' support is an important factor.

PC's not 'bureaucracy's lackeys'

Dear Editor:

Recently there has appeared comment in the Campus newspapers concerning the stand taken by the Ontario P.C. Campus Association, in Youth Matters, in the OFS question at Western University. The articles that I read displayed a basic misunderstanding of the PC youth's attitude towards the OFS, and what PC youth organizations are really about.

It has been claimed that Ontario PC youth are out to "destroy" the OFS. Nothing could be further from the truth. Ontario PC youth supports the concept of a province-wide lobby for post-secondary school students. YPC's were involved in the formation of the OFS, and three years ago, the Ontario PC Campus Association held a joint policy conference with the Federation at Brock University.

What objections the PC Campus Association has had with the OFS recently is not the fact that such an organization exists, but with the direction which the Federation is taking in approaching problems with the Ministry of Colleges and Universities. One need only look over the back issues of the OFS tabloid The Ontario Student, particularly those for the fall of 1975 and the spring of 1976, to be aware of a distinct bias in favour of the Ontario New Democratic Party.

Since the OFS is funded by almost every university and college student in the province it is a pity that the Federation's tabloid editor chose to take such an arbitrary political stand. Such an arbitrary stand serves only to undermine the OFS's bargaining position with the government and discourages involvement by those whose political opinions differ with the Federation's.

While I am on the topic of politics I thought I would explain the role that the Ontario PC Campus Association has played in lobbying for the university and college students' interests at Queen's Park and within the Ontario PC party. Referring to the Report of the Policy and Resolutions Committee of the Ontario PC Association Annual Meeting of May 1976 one finds that the Campus Association submitted six resolutions dealing with post secondary education. All six resolutions were passed by the meeting and submitted to the provincial cabinet for consideration. These resolutions contained a demand for the publication of the government's long term plans in post secondary education, that funds be made available to hire a greater percentage of Canadian professors, and that regular meetings be held between a liaison committee of the Ministry of Colleges and Universities and the student presidents of community colleges and universities.

With regard to tuition, the PC Campus Association has requested that tuition fees be continued to be regulated by the Ministry of Colleges and Universities rather than the individual colleges and universities, that there be an annual review of tuition so as to prevent the large infrequent fee hikes that presently plague students, and that the government institute a differential fee structure for foreign students attending Ontario universities. This last resolution was passed by the general meeting prior to the announcement by the Minister that such a differential fee scheme was to be implemented.

Columnist George F. Will recently described the American presidential candidates as "tiresome little men clawing at Lincoln's chair". Howard K. Smith (no relation!) relegated the contents of the campaign and election to the scrap heap calling it "almost entirely fluff". Perhaps the most poignant comment I ran across was from the celebrated historian and political analyst, Arthur Schlesinger Jr., who describes the campaign "a demeaning, empty offensive campaign. What a hell of a way to celebrate the Bicentennial!"

Although the naivety of the predictions of "national television" on election eve have now been substantiated, only 54 percent of those eligible to vote exercised their franchise. Many of those who did vote were unimpressed by the alternatives. Walter Stewart recorded comments (on entering the polling station), such as "where can I vote for one of those dummies?" and "I started out for Jimmy Carter but potpourie of hacks, movie stars, and sports celebrities. Carter simply 'smiled clean' and 'talked dirty'. He linked Ford to Marx. Both, he said, believed wars solved unemployment. Carter blamed Herbert Hoover entirely for the Great Depression and suggested that Hoover was Ford's prototype. In domestic affairs Carter waffled on everything: health insurance—well not really; job creation—only if balancing the budget came first; a cut in defence spending—who knows? On a straight-forward term like racial discrimination Carter talked integration. He confined his concrete responses to the opposition of an all-white church in Plains (shades of George Wallace). Carter simply blew an incredible Gallop and Roper poll lead, winning on a home-boy vote in the South, and a clothes-pin vote in the North.

The election had the makings of a classic battle. There are sharp differences between the parties on domestic policy, slightly less on foreign policy. The voters would have had clear, well accentuated alternatives. What happened? Carter, entering the presidential milieu, was a fresh face at the outset of the campaign, but travelling with a "sunburst of smiles" he gradually showed his colour by currying favour with power brokers like Richard Daley and Frank Rizzo. The promise of new politics has a cynical ring after Carter's dealing with George Wallace, George Meany, and a allowing someone else to take over—someone who is satisfied with the job the way it stands.

Let us not forget that you were the first Journal Editor who was paid a salary for the summer, a considerable amount I might add. You proposed at that time to write a booklet on the techniques of producing a newspaper to aid new staff and to complete the bulk of the work for the year's paper, supposedly so that you would not have to take as much time from your school work. The quality of this year's paper certainly does not reflect this previous work. Was it ever actually accomplished?

If you feel that you must be paid for the number of hours you put into a job, why not resign as Journal Editor and apply to the Pub? In that way you would be earning a salary, what appears to be your ultimate goal in a job.

Susan Toy
Ed. Note: It is unfortunate that the point of this editorial was missed entirely. It is even more unfortunate that Ms. Toy would put the issue on a personal level.

No, I am not dissatisfied with the level of compensation received. I assumed this position after three years of involvement and did so, as you noted, in full knowledge of the financial compensation to be received as outlined in the AMS constitution.

Our editorial position last Friday questioned the justice of having salaried and honouraria positions in the AMS organization. The method of selection seems immaterial to the fact that the work load and responsibilities of the Journal editor, pub manager, AMS executive and chief constable are in many ways the same. That thousands of dollars per year are given to some of these people and not others constitutes in our minds an unjust system of compensation. We would point out again that this discrepancy can be eliminated in two ways: pay everyone salaries or drop everyone to honouraria.

And yes, the "booklet" on layout was done.

Once in office, the PQ will have to face political reality, both internal and external. The party is divided between leftist socialists and moderate independentists. Levesque will have to control both factions though it would appear the party as a whole is presently concerned with establishing their government and trading carefully on political eggs. The PQ government will also have to placate investors and provide a climate favourable to investment to bolster their economy.

Inevitably, there are going to be negotiations between Ottawa and Quebec about the benefits of federalism for the province. Quebec wants to be an "associate state" within Canada, holding special powers and rights accorded to it by virtue of its being the protector and holder of a culture and language in Canada. I feel these approaching talks may strengthen the support for the federal liberals. People may feel it's best to have a French-Canadian such as M. Trudeau negotiating in such a situation. Being a Quebecer and a confirmed federalist, M. Trudeau would fight for Quebec's staying in Confederation with intellectual, emotional and constitutional tools. Canadians may think English-Canadians such as Joe Clark or Ed Broadbent would not have the experience or capability to bargain on such a potentially explosive issue.

I feel there may be a danger in English and French-Canadians' being overly rational and complacent concerning the future of Quebec and Canada. Separatism is an emotional issue, reflecting the bitterness and frustration of Quebec. Hard economic reality and the possibility of adverse social effects may be strong factors against separating. But Quebec could separate despite a hard future to save a culture, language and integrity.

On the whole, I hope this election in Quebec will make Canadians more aware of the possible threat to Confederation and promote a much-needed tolerance of the French-Canadian language and culture.

Salary or Honouraria?

Dear Editor:

I was somewhat appalled upon reading your editorial, "Unjust Compensation" (Nov 26). Are you not satisfied by the remuneration allotted to the position which you hold as Journal Editor? Must you be monetarily compensated for everything you do?

Drawing a comparison between the senior Pub staff, the A.M.S. Executive and the Journal Editor contains one enormous flaw that perhaps you did not consider, elected. The Pub staff and the A.M.S. constables purposely apply to those positions in order to work long hours in exchange for payment. It is part of an agreement which they make when they are hired by the A.M.S. On the other hand, the A.M.S. Executive and Journal Editor are elected to their positions by the student body or newspaper staff with the understanding of what their positions entail, including the amount of honoraria they will receive. To suggest that you should be paid the same as a hired staff is out of order as far as I am concerned.

You knew at the time that you were running for Journal Editor exactly what the job involved. You expressed the desire to work for the paper as much as was necessary. People believed in what you said at that time and they, therefore, elected you. Why are you now complaining about something which you should have considered months ago? At that time, there were other people who were willing to take on the job for no compensation, except the mere satisfaction of knowing a job well done. If this is not enough for you, then perhaps you should consider

The Quebec election. Its immediate and future significance, the reasons behind a PQ victory, problems of separation. These have all been discussed at length during the past week. However, I will attempt to outline the major points discussed and present a few of my thoughts.

It has been suggested that the overwhelming victory of the Parti Quebecois was determined largely by a protest vote by Quebecers against Bourassa and his liberal government. This election could then be classified as a deviating election, one which produced an atypical result determined by unusual circumstances in this case, after showing disaffection with Bourassa and his party, the next election could revert to the former party alignment. But to the extent that the PQ provides good government within the next four years, the election may become an example of a re-aligning election. The favourable performance of the PQ government would consolidate a shift in the basic support of the voters and begin a new era in Quebec politics.

Political scientists, politicians and journalists have been quick to reassure Canada that 41 percent of the Quebec public does not necessarily support separatism. Voters may have voted for the PQ because of a need for good government, economic reform or social welfare. A province-wide referendum would determine Quebec's choice for or against separatism from the federal structure of Canada. However, I see a problem with the results of a referendum. If 51 percent vote for separation, that leaves 49 percent against. Is this substantial portion of the populace to be ignored by the (in this case) shortcomings of democratic workings? Or will the Parti Quebecois have to define the percentage greater than a majority as the necessary level of consensus?

Craftmanship and ingenuity in a dying art

by DAN P.H. PARLE

One of the greatest gifts that native North Americans gave to Canada was the canoe. When the Europeans first came to this land of lakes they realized that the Indians had invented the perfect craft for travel in Canada; the birch bark canoe. The Europeans immediately adopted it for the blossoming fur trade.

Despite the talk of "savages" that inhabited North America no one argued that the birch bark canoe was a triumph of craftsmanship and ingenuity. Anyone who has seen such a canoe realizes that it is not merely a slit of birch bark sewn together at each end. The Indians produced a craft of such complicated design with so few tools that one can only marvel at it.

The Indians needed a craft that was light (for easy portaging) yet strong enough to hold up to wear and tear. They needed a craft that could be paddled and steered with the paddler facing the direction of travel. The European longboat, which puts the oarsmen facing the stern of the boat would never do in the smaller rivers of Canada where the navigator has to see ahead to prevent the boat from floundering. The Indians needed a craft that was easily manoeuvred, had a shallow draft and could hold a large cargo. Amazingly the birch bark canoe was all of these things.

The woods canoe, which was used on small lakes and streams weighed no more than 60 pounds and could be completely turned around in an area almost as small as the length of the canoe itself. It could hold more weight than a rowboat of the same length. The Indians developed hundreds of different designs for the craft to suit the intended purpose of the canoe. For example a canoe that was intended to be used in large bodies of water was larger for more stability. War canoes were built for speed.

For a craft that was a major achievement of craftsmanship among a primitive people and one that has played a major role in the history of North America the birch bark canoe has been largely ignored.

Little mention of it is made in anthropology courses and it has been the subject of too few books. Modern counterparts of the birch bark canoe have been widened for stability but have sacrificed grace. Only the canvas canoe and a few of the well designed fibre-glass canoes can claim to retain some of the true flavour of this amazing craft. The canoe is actually a stable and easy craft to feel at home in one you understand its mysteries and have mastered the art of paddling.

Isolated Indian craftsmen still make birch bark canoes although much of the art has been lost. A young man named Henri Vallancourt is devoting his life to the building of birch bark canoes in Maine. There is a small museum near Dorset, Ontario, devoted to the subject. A birch bark canoe was displayed at last year's Sportsman's Show, although the crowd showed much more interest in the nearby fibre-glass canoes.

We would know very little of the birch bark canoe today if it had not been for one man, Edwin Tappan Adney. Anthropologist-naturalist Adney devoted his life to the study of the construction of the birch bark canoe before the art was lost. Adney died before he could publish his life's work but Howard I. Chappelle compiled it in The Bark Canoes and Skin Boats of North America. It is an extremely hard book to attain, no library in Hamilton has one. The pictures illustrating this story are from this book.

An Indian undertaking the task of building a canoe did so with few tools. Most important of these was the "crooked knife" which can be best described as one a one handed drawknife. On top of this an Indian canoe builder might carry with him a measuring stick indicating dimensions taken of a canoe that was considered a good one. The introduction of European tools made tasks easier for the Indians but no way changed the actual design of the canoe.

The first task was to find a suitable paper birch tree. At times canoes were made of other barks such as elms but these canoes were built only as poor substitutes in emergency situations where birch bark could not be obtained. In his travels the canoe builder always kept his eye open for sizeable trees with few marks on the bark.

Where possible, the bark was always peeled in the Spring because the freshly running sap made for easy removal.

On a freshly felled tree the bark can usually be removed without damage. A slit of about 1/4 of an inch deep is made down the length of the tree. The bark is then pulled back around the circumference of the tree with the rind of the tree still adhering to it. If the canoe builder is lucky the bark will be tough, leather-like, and up to 1/4 inch thick.

The craftsman then transported the bark to the building site. This site had to have sandy soil and was preferably situated in the shade. The builder then shaped the form he wanted his canoe to take in the sandy soil. The birch bark that formed the bottom of the canoe was weighted down with stones. Then the bark that formed the side of the canoe was gored and held in place by a series of stakes. The gores were necessary in order to allow the canoe to take its slightly curved shape. If it was at all possible the builder avoided having these gores fall below the water line since they had to be sewn up and sealed. These seams were potential weak spots in the canoes.

Once the builder had the bark in the general shape of his canoe he attached the gunwale (cedar strips of wood running along the edge of the canoe) and the thwarts (wooden crosspieces made of maple). These pieces were mortised and lashed to the canoe.

After this step the stakes were removed and the canoe was taken from the building bed and turned upside down. Now the builder shaped the ends of the canoe and sewed up the gores with spruce roots. Spruce roots were used because they could be found in lengths of up to twenty feet without varying much from 3-8th of an inch in diameter.

Once sewn, the seams were sealed with the sticky sap of the spruce. After going through the tedious chore of collecting the sap the canoe builder boiled it and tempered it with ashes, which made it a little more brittle, and animal fat, which made it tacky.

The next step was to produce cedar ribs to give strength and shape to the canoe. The ribs were split with great accuracy with stone age tools. They were carved into shape and then warped with the aid of boiling water and steam.

If the builder wished to decorate his canoe he did so by scraping the rind off the bark and revealing the lighter colour below. It was the dark inner part of the canoe that formed the outside of the canoe, NOT THE WHITE SURFACE.

The process described in this article is of course just an overview of how the bark canoe was built. Methods and styles were as varied as the tribes who made the canoe. In addition, the individual, in the true sense of craftsmanship left his personal stamp on the construction of the craft.

Today millions of pleasure canoeists owe their enjoyment to the craftsmen who developed the original bark canoe. Complex yet simple, the canoe was, and still is a marvel.

Moonie Magic:

wooning today's youth

by Julie Wiernik
(adapted from Ryerson Magazine)

His soothing British accent has a way of muting the urgency of his sermon; but just as it does, he jars the congregation with a sudden adamant burst. "The world is divided... Hate... War... Satan's Domain... Struggle... The spirit world... Fallen Man... Atheistic Communism... Terry Brabazon delivers the pessimistic perspective to an unflinching audience. "Each moment is an opportunity to build an ideal world," he continues. "We can build it with our own hands... with shooting now, with confidence and a voice too big for the small, and by this time, stuffy room."

The week always begins this way, sending fire through this brigade inspired by an uncompromising demand of the ideal. They're bent-on-believing Moonies, followers of Reverend Sun Myung Moon, a pudgy, 57-year-old Korean evangelist whom some call holy man and others call huckster.

Moon's controversial movement, also known as The Unification Church, is not new. He founded it in South Korea in 1954 and brought it with him to the United States on an immigrant visa in 1973. Nor is this movement-called "cult" by the press and "religious fringe group" by psychiatrists-unique.

But the Moonies are in full focus now, grabbing headlines as an outlandish organization which last month staged a $1 million rally at the Washington Monument, drawing a crowd of 50,000 by police estimates and 200,000 by church estimates. Moon heads a $15 million conglomerate in South Korea, which produces paint, pharmaceuticals, argins and ginseng tea. The church owns real estate in the United States valued at about $20 million including a 22 acre estate at Tarrytown, N.Y. ($85,000), a 25-room mansion ($625,000) overlooking the Hudson River in nearby Irvington for Moon, his wife and their eight children, and a $1.5 million "training centre" at Barrytown, N.Y., formerly the Christian Brothers' monastery.

The church owns or rents numerous houses and offices in more than 100 North American cities. In Canada, the Moonies have "centres" in Vancouver, Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto. In Toronto, the hub of Canadian operations, the church owns a huge house at 588 Spadina Ave., which accommodates between five and thirty followers depending on where and when their cross-country paths meet. In addition, they maintain a spacious, well-furnished office in the Samuel Diamond Building at 696 Yonge St., just south of Bloor Street.

Moonie family at 588 Spadina Ave. "The average team member brings in about $150. That's $1,050 a day, or $5,250 a week if the team puts in a five-day week. Take that elementary arithmetic one step further for a rough estimate of the team's annual take. About $237,000.

Loren occasionally finds himself assigned to the fund raising team. He's baby-faced, but pushing 30, and wears an out-of-shape navy herringbone tweed suit despite the afternoon warmth. (Neat, conservative dress is part of the typical Moonie manner coupled with a perpetual smile that would make Jimmy Carter's jaw ache). Loren is a timid, soft-spoken fellow who sheepishly admits he's not very good at fund raising though he's been at it for almost a year. "But fund raising comes easier the more spiritually developed you are, and the more you fund raise the more spiritually developed you become," he explains. Because the Moonie's perpetual goal is spiritual development, they fund raise with more fervor than a coach at a half-time pep talk.

Spiritual sustenance is bound up in Divine Principle, Moon's black book which is easily mistaken for the Bible at first glance. The principle is Christian ideology with snippets of eastern philosophy sprinkled throughout. It draws heavily from Old Testament stories, sometimes adding a new twist to them. In a nutshell, it's this: God intended Adam and Eve to have perfect children, but Satan seduced Eve, who in turn seduced Adam, bringing about the Fall of Man. Jesus was supposed to indemnify all that by marrying and fathering perfect children, but people wouldn't unite with Jesus, so Fallen Man never got back on his feet. Now we are awaiting the third and final Messiah, presumably Moon, though church members keep the identity of the Messiah a closely-held secret.

Anti-communism and U.S. military and monetary support for the South Korean government are equally important principles. In fact, The Unification Church has recently been linked to the South Korean Central Intelligence Agency, whose officers work closely with South Korean diplomats to influence U.S. foreign policy. It's said that the agency thinks Moon is eccentric and opportunistic, but find the money and manpower of his organization extremely useful.

The Moonies strive day in and day out - and sometimes night in and night out too - to understand Moon's Divine Principle. It's single-minded study with a world united under Christianity at the end of the rainbow. But it's rarely the religious principle that draws people into Moon's fold, says Toronto psychiatrist Saul Levine, whose study, Youth and Contemporary Religious Movements: Psychological Findings, will soon be published in the Canadian Psychiatric Association Journal.

That people turn to religious groups such as The Unification Church is the fault of our society, Levine maintains. "These people are incredibly receptive to answers. They feel they've been given answers. These answers may not satisfy us, but then, ours don't make any sense to them either. We must know where our society is failing and how these groups fill voids in the lives of their members. These religions, as fatuous and reprehensible as some of us may find them, are improving the personal lives of many of their members." Psychiatrist Daniel Cappon, who practises analytical therapy and also teaches environmental studies at York University, is far less sympathetic in his assessment of the religious fringe group and the personalities drawn to it.

"People in these fringe groups are unusual personalities, ranging from near normal to pre-psychotic or marginally psychotic," he says. "Some of them are on the streets because they're not in mental hospitals. We use drugs to keep people out of mental hospitals because we don't believe in incarceration to the extent we used to." Cappon explains that "proof of normality is being able to sustain the tremendous uncertainty about life, which many cultists cannot cope with."

Whatever personality types the church attracts and whatever it offers them, it has flourished since Moon settled in the United States. The church claims two million followers worldwide. In Canada and the United States, there are 7,000 core members and 23,000 associate members. But the opposition has grown just as rapidly and is at least as large, people are clamoring for a Congressional investigation and calling for an end to the church's tax-exempt status.

Thousands of distraught parents, psychiatrists and others would also like to see Moon and his black book deported. They charge that the church lures young people (average member age is 25) into the fold, confiscates their values, their minds and their bank books. Newcomers, critics charge, are easy prey because they are isolated from family and friends in training centres where they are deprived of sleep and are subjected to marathon lectures. They contend these children have been taught they must avoid family and friends because they are agents of Satan. In a word, they cry brainwashing.

Levine says he saw no evidence during his study that the converts of any sect were products of brainwashing. On the other hand, Cappon insists that the cultists are guilty of brainwashing. "Some of these leaders are not only after the buck, but they're also after the soul."

On one of my Sunday morning visits to the Spadina centre, I asked Loren how he's been since I last saw him. "Oh I've been sleeping a lot lately," he replies in his usual, slow, thoughtful manner. "I'm just saturated," he says with a little cooing. The constant go, the fund raising, the prayers, the lectures and other family activities are wearing him thin, he says with more cooing. "It's just like watering a lawn," Loren sighs. "I mean, it can only absorb so much then it just can't hold anymore."

Coming Through Slaughter

Ondaatje's polish makes powerful magic

by Grant Heckman

Michael Ondaatje has written four books of poetry, including "The Collected Works of Billy the Kid", which earned him the 1970 Governor General's Award. In that book he combined poetry, prose, and period photographs with historical accounts of the outlaw's life. In Coming Through Slaughter, his first novel, he has again dealt with an historical figure, and, in doing so, created a moving story of an artist and his descent into madness.

The book is about Buddy Bolden, a New Orleans jazz cornetist from the turn of the century. He works as a barber by day, sleeps for four hours, and then plays screaming jazz all night. One day he disappears; his wife - former whore Nora Bass - moves in with another member of his band. He stays away two years, and then, four days after his return, goes mad while playing in a parade. He is sent away to an asylum, where he lives on another twenty-four years.

It was a one-sentence reference to the parade episode that got Ondaatje interested in Bolden. The juxtaposition appealed to him; madness, the most private of events, in the context of a parade, one of the most public. The musician's mental turmoil is explored through dreams, hallucinations, and a variety of other perspectives. Throughout the book Ondaatje stretches the boundaries of conventional prose; he omits commas to produce a frantic, rushing effect, and employs long lists and repetitive phrases to convey the wearying attrition of Bolden's lifestyle.

What makes the book unique though, in addition to the constant switching of the mental state from which the narrative issues, is the poetic foundation of every phrase; at once natural and highly stylized. Novels written by poets often seem to have been conceived one clause at a time, nay, with every word equally important. The jump to traditional prose is not completely made, and much to the benefit of the work. Leonard Cohen's "Beautiful Losers" might be one example, though it seems excessive and self-indulgent beside Coming Through Slaughter. Ondaatje has assembled each passage with the precision of a haiku. Like his books of poetry, it is written with a kind of tough eloquence; spare and evocatively balanced at one point, lyrical and elegant at another. While the whole text of the book is arranged in a standard prose configuration, there are passages so poetic in texture and cadence that one unconsciously makes appropriate line breaks as one reads.

"On into the night and into the blue mornings, growing louder the notes burning through and off everyone and forgotten in the body because they were swallowed in the next one after and Bolden and Lewis and Cornish and Mumford sending them forward and forth and forth till, as he could see them, their bursts of air were animals fighting in the room."

The book is populated with all manner of low life characters, men like Bellocq, the tiny lame photographer who amasses thousands of portraits of the local whores. Then there are the whores themselves; Bricktop Jackson, who wields a fifteen-inch knife, and "One-legged Duffy", who is murdered with her own wooden leg.

There are a couple of unnecessary inclusions, two "songs" (the only poetry in the book arranged as such on the page) in which a single sentence is repeated and-or rearranged, and three sonographs of the sound of a dolphin, which are inserted with a little explanatory paragraph before the text of the novel. These things would probably have been better left in a notebook somewhere, but they are minor flaws in an otherwise polished and powerful book. In Coming Through Slaughter, Ondaatje has worked the rare magic by which so careful and refined a work can project so elemental an energy.

Theatre St. Lawrence

Flawless production from start to finish

I had not been to the fourth floor theatre at St. Lawrence College before. It is a small, intimate theatre, seemingly suspended from the heights of the main administrative building. Black walls envelope the viewer in inky depth, while above run rows of lighting instruments. Two banks of multi-coloured chairs slope modestly away, until the audience and the stage become one. Here, immediacy and emotion are consummated. In this theatre an actor's projections necessitate response.

The design is very much to Mr. Roger Dunn's advantage. His excellent production of William Hanley's Slow Dance On The Killing Ground requires the attention and the participation that that theatre demands of its audience. But this is merely to make mention of the obvious. What may be lost in a larger, more complex edifice certainly could not detract from the professionalism of Theatre St. Lawrence. All concerns have come together here to present an outstanding production. No flaw is to be found in either the acting or in the stage and costume design, or in the directing.

Slow Dance is a period piece. It is a 1960's play in its scope and in the style in which it is written. Here, life is a slow shuffle with inevitability, or fate if you wish; a box step danced in a war zone, a no man's land, a "killing ground" from which no one escapes. Three characters figure in this dance of death: Mr. Glas, a German immigrant, who hides from the troubles of life behind the dirty windows of his candy store in Brooklyn, and yet, ironically desires to be judged and punished for crimes committed. Randall, a young black, whose racial heritage and exceptional intelligence quotient, as well as his sympathetic, but violent nature constantly conflict with the mores of American society.

and Rosie, a young, but not pretty, middle class academic, who is in need of an abortionist. The entire action of the play takes place on June 1st, 1962 in Mr. Glas's store. During the course of the evening the lives of these three characters are drawn and stretched taut before us as they challenge and respond to each others' needs to be identified and tested.

Themes and symbols run rampant throughout the play. The director has done a remarkable job of underlining and identifying the more pertinent ideas, and has, I think, quite prudently refused to limit the dramatic potential of his vehicle by concentrating on any one theme. Prevalent is the symbolic use of colour and nomenclature, to name no more.

The acting is superb. Each action is precisely executed. The gestures are all properly defined, giving meaning to the character portrayed. And responses are direct and deliberate. There is an exactness here, found only in professional theatres. I cannot compliment John Swindells (Mr. Glas), Philip Akin (Randall) and Stacey Haslam (Rosie) enough for their remarkable performances. Credit must also go to Trevor Hodgson for his very adaptable set, and to Lorraine Heaney for her fine costume designs.

Mr. Dunn's is a very clear production of Slow Dance On The Killing Ground. It is an excellent evening at the theatre, and well worth the trip out to St. Lawrence College.

White River Bluegrass Band

Plays folk music in overdrive

By Eric Hughes

Once there were two White Rivers, one in Quebec and one in Vermont. Now there are three. There is the White River Bluegrass Band whose name illustrates both the groups origins and their style of music. They play what they call "folk music in overdrive" with a hard, driving rhythm and an infectious beat.

The group, formed in September 1974 consists of four players as opposed to the usual five members of the traditional bluegrass band. Bob Cussen of Montreal who plays mandolin and fiddle with the group, has come to this juncture of his career after serving as back-up man for many of Montreal's top-notch country and western acts, and playing with his own Bobby Cussen Trio.

On five-string banjo is Wolfgang Poll, a native of Germany and alumnus of the same Bobby Cussen Trio. Sid Gulik can be found on guitar, dobro and musical saw. He developed these many talents on his world travels and in his engagements with Ray Adair and his Woodbury Woodchucks and Ted Bare and the Panderers. The bass line is drawn by Stephen Barry of Lachine who comes via the McGill Jazz Society and other bands, including The Mountain City Four, Jesse Winchester, Penny Lang, The Sidewinders and The Stephen Barry Blues Band.

Their act is selected from some 110 set pieces, ranging from authentic bluegrass numbers like "Cripple Creek", to early 60's folk tunes adapted to the bluegrass idiom. They do not play solely for the purists, but from all reports, the have a lot of fun doing what they do.

The White River Bluegrass Band will be appearing at Bitter Grounds on Friday, Dec 3.

The Chalmers Singers

Sacred choral music, the old and the new

The Chalmers Singers will give the premiere performance of a work written by Kingstonian composer Richard Bronskill, at a concert this Friday evening in Sydenham Street United Church, Sydenham and William Streets.

The new composition is a Missa Brevis, based on a setting of ancient prayers used in most Catholic and Protestant churches. It was written last summer.

Born in Kingston, Richard Bronskill graduated from the Faculty of Music at the University of Toronto four years ago. Since then he has spent a year teaching for CUSO in Jamaica, and several years teaching and composing in Kingston. His work in productions in the Drama Department at Queen's. This year he is doing graduate study in composition in Toronto.

Other music on the program will include the Seven Liturgical Motets by the late dean of Canadian composers, Healey Willan, and two works with orchestral instruments - Bach's Cantata 112, and a Magnificat by the eighteenth-century Italian composer Pergolesi. Willan was Principal of the Royal Conservatory in Toronto, Professor of Music at the U. of T., and organist and choir-master of the old Anglican church of St. Mary Magdalene for almost forty years. Although his music is published, and performed, all over the world, much of it was written for the services of this church, including the set of seven great Liturgical Motets which will be sung by the Chalmers group.

Director of the Chalmers Singers, David Cameron, says that "even though Willan didn't intend them to be sung as a group, it's a fascinating study to hear them all together. It's like a close-up of a very great musical mind doing what it most enjoyed doing - translating fine religious poetry into the most gorgeous floating sounds".

Director of Music at Chalmers Church since 1966, Cameron teaches organ and ear training for the Music Department, and music at the Theological College. He is also conductor of the Pro Arte Singers of Kingston, and host of a nightly recorded concert on CKLC-FM. His Chalmers Singers are the choir of Chalmers Church, and are heard in the church's Sunday services, which have been broadcast live for more than twenty years. They have also been heard regularly in concerts like the one this Friday, in most centres between Brockville and London, Ontario.

The Friday concert is being held in Sydenham Street church, rather than in Chalmers' own building on Barrie Street, because of acoustics, according to Mr. Cameron. "Chalmers is carpeted", he says, "and to make the most of soaring choral music like Willan's you need a more resonant room. It means moving a couple of blocks and the difference is well worth the trouble". Admission is only two dollars, and tickets are available from Vern Napier's, The Book Merchant, The House of Sounds, and - nearest the campus - the Chalmers Church office at 212 Barrie Street.

Bradstreet was terrific as usual

by Davis Eagle

What can you say about David Bradstreet? I mean what can you say? Last weekend he came into town with a touch of the flu and a case of the road-weary blues to weigh him down and nevertheless got it together enough to play encore performances to packed houses at the Scarcrow. The reason he was able to come across as well as he did is the same reason he occupies the premier spot on the Canadian coffeehouse scene, namely his professional attitude towards what is for him a normal gig. His professionalism rests on his strictly musical ability, subsumed under which is the superb union of his own and Carl Kesse's sounds, and his critical ear, which is inclined towards the constant improvement and subsequent refreshment of his music.

The guest sets last weekend were split between Short Turn, a Toronto-based trio, and Thom Case, a transplanted good-old boy from North Carolina. Case who played on Thursday night, lit into the audience with a combination of his own and Willie P. Bennett's material plus a peculiar supre-humour which left the jeopardy. Short Turn, featuring Kirk crowd if not in stitches at least in Elliot played standards for the most part through with a freshness that prevented staleness. Both Short Turn and Thom Case were impressive and well received and are expected back in the spring for weekends of their own.

Bradstreet, who has been playing in Kingston since 1967 in various disguises, has always puzzled me as to his terrific success. . . not that he doesn't deserve it because he does, but there are other musicians of the same (or close to the same) ability who have had no response worth mentioning. Well this past weekend I figured it out . . . are you ready??? It's because he is such a neat guy. While he is on stage, it seems that each member of the audience feels as if Bradstreet is the kind of guy that you can hang out with.

I think that it's one of the things that sets him apart from 'yer average folkie'; that and Carl Kesse who has got to be one of the best bass players around. It is indicative of Bradstreet's personality that he mentioned at numerous times during the weekend that everybody should see Frank Wheeler when he comes . . . it shows that he is interested in promoting good times for everybody concerned, even if he won't be there to provide them.

Craft show at Agnes

Fourteen artisans, working in a variety of media, were invited to participate in the very large exhibition of "Contemporary Ontario Crafts", opening to the public at the Agnes Etherington Art Centre on December 5, and continuing until January 30, 1977.

"The purpose of this exhibition" says Frances K. Smith, Curator of the Arts Centre, "is not to present a comprehensive survey of fine crafts in all media, but by a selection of a limited number of works, to suggest the range and high quality of both design and workmanship now being produced in Ontario by professional craftsmen and craftswomen".

There are fourteen participants in the show, and with as many as seven works exhibited by any one artist, the public will be able to view hand-crafted objects of gold, silver, pewter, stoneware, porcelain and various woods as well as crocheted yarn, macramé and other tapestries. A comprehensive handlist, with photographs and brief biographies of each participant accompanies the exhibition.

Dr. Duane Bates conducted the Queen's Wind Ensemble as they played a variety of English music on Friday night.

Pendragon's "Love's Labours Won"

On the whole, a half-hearted attempt

by Eric Hughes

Last Saturday marked the closing of Love's Labours Won, the first production of the new theatre group Pendragon, The Players' Company. The rationale behind the group is certainly a noble one; however, if one uses the quality of this production as a measure of the experiment's success, one would have to admit that a certain amount of revision is required before Pendragon can become an artistic or commercial force in Ontario, or for that matter Kingston, theatre.

"Learn the action firstly, then the manner of the action second." This advice given in the play could also be given to the play. Imposing activity on top of lines is not a short-cut to interpretation, it is a short-cut to disaster. An actor should use his script as a terrain to explore, not as a map of the most expedient route for getting from A to B. Activity is not action.

The play was, on the whole, a half-hearted attempt. Director Ralph

Peter did not choose to push his act in any way - in fact the director's touch was singularly lacking throughout. There was little pacing - only pushing. Many of the play's best lines were lost within the pseudo-Shakespearean poetry, or glossed over in the rush to keep us from noticing that the play makes a short story long. The two and one-half hours of playing time should be at least one hour shorter. As an original script, LLW has not had the benefit of professional paring. Author David Fanstone should sharpen his shears and get down to some ruthless chopping between now and the company's tour.

Technically, the show was neither here nor there. Some lighting effects were particularly well set-up (notably George Pothos' shadow-show fight with an imagined monster). However, many of the actors' faces were hidden in darkness - and not always, it seemed, for any special reason.

The costuming was equally ambivalent. The Duke (played amiably by Doug Stratten) was pleasantly clothed to suit both character and situation, but how can one believe that a group of young girls would travel for days on foot in the same clothes in which they are subsequently married? And, dome fasteners do not hold costumes together when frenetic activity is involved, (nor were they invented in 1630, if I am not mistaken).

The performances ranged from pleasing to creditable to just plain bad. Without indulging in yet another plot summary, let me say that whenever Doug Stratten as the Duke, Phil Tarrant as his lovable servant Osric, Heather Dick as the strong and witty Mother-Abbess, Mary-Anne Beamish as the saucy Bettina, Julie Salverson as the warmhearted and cunning Rosalynn or Phil Tunley as the ancient actor Bland were on the stage, we could relax and enjoy ourselves. These performers had the style that the rest of the production lacked. They played what was written and played it well.

In spite of the major disappointment of this first production, I am still rooting for Pendragon. There is a lot of talent in this company. The objective of presenting original material is a sound one, and can certainly work. The Players' Company simply has to be more critical of itself. The dress that was Love's Labours Won can certainly pass for gold, but no self-respecting company should allow itself to fall into the position of having to play con-man. Criticism begets change begets confidence begets relaxation begets enjoyment. There is nothing as pleasing as watching actors having fun with a script. Ultimately that is what an audience looks for in its entertainment, and the Pendragon experiment is tailor-made for that purpose. All they have to do is try it on and see how well it really can fit.

Was there a Conspiracy at Bitter Grounds?

by Andrew Page

Folk aficionados at the Bitter Grounds Saturday night were treated to a rare musical event - a performance by a group which does not actually exist. Lured by the name "Perth County Conspiracy" fans found instead the DNE trio consisting of Terry-Jones on guitar and vocals, David Woodhead on bass, and Jerome Jarvis on cymbals, Tabla, tambourine, whistles, and the 9 mm. open-ended A-flat Huskey wrench.

At first impression the results were pleasing. Jones has a fine singing voice, plays a very adequate guitar, and is in general a capable performer. David Woodhead on bass was exceptional, laying down nice runs, chords, and lead riffs in a very smooth manner. Jarvis produced a variety of percussive effects and comic relief-topped off by the clear triangle-like tones of the A-flat wrench: to round out a good stage show.

Upon a second consideration, factors beside gloss and individual musicianship become significant. The Perth County Conspiracy is in effect a modular musical aggregation - which means that it can be (and usually is) disassembled and reassembled in a variety of combinations depending upon the occasion. As Saturday night demonstrated, this can work against the musicians, as well as for them, making it extra difficult to produce the clean, tight music coffee-house connoisseurs expect. Some of the songs were performed unrehearsed by the group, and it showed, especially with the vocal harmonies (And it is with vocal harmonies that the excellence of groups most clearly shines through-virtually everything else can be "faked" by good musicians.) There are those, of course, who favor spontaneity in music. It was a good night for them.

Another factor involved, oddly enough, is one of ethics. This reviewer attended expecting to see Perth County Conspiracy. The ads proclaimed Conspiracy, plus an asterisk and some mysterious initials. What was delivered was not in fact the conspiracy, but Terry Jones and friends. There was just a little too much cute wording and slick-marketing for comfort. What was promised wasn't delivered.

The material performed was of uniformly good quality. That it was just a little too uniform showed by the end of the second set. The players themselves lacked enthusiasm, perhaps due to the diffuse nature of the lyrics. Many of the songs stated no clear meaning, and that can present difficulties in performance. A notable exception was a beautiful statement (recently aired on a CBC radio program on the demise of the whale (about man's troubled relationship with his all-too-fragile environment. It is nice to hear a song these days that breaks away from clichés and actually says something).

A highlight of the evening was guest artist Rob Young, who was especially impressive in his choice of material. He drew a warm response from the remarkably friendly and receptive crowd.

Queen's Chamber Orchestra

Playing Beethoven in his playful moods

Queen's Chamber Orchestra, under their director Clifford Crawley, will present an all Beethoven concert in Grant Hall on Wednesday, 1 December, 1976 at 8:30 p.m.

The piano soloist featured in the first movement of the "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra No. 4 in G major" is Thomas Davidson, now in his third year of the Bachelor of Music program at Queen's. Davidson, who has won a number of awards at the Ottawa Music Festival, studies piano with Irene Zuk of the Music Department, and comes from Ottawa. The Concerto, which is considered to be one of Beethoven's masterpieces was written at about the same time as the well-known 5th Symphony, and some similar motives can be detected in both works. It depicts the composer as being gentle and smiling in mood, rather than the aggressive characteristics which are often associated with his works.

The program opens with "Twelve Country Dances", (an early work of Beethoven's which foreshadows some later more important works) and closes with the performance of "Symphony No. 8 in F major". This too be the composer's favourite. This is a fairly short work but on a large scale despite its conciseness.

All the pieces make considerable demands on the orchestra for instance, the Dances entail changes of speed and mood; the Concerto has subtle changes of mood plus the problems of accompanying a soloist, and the Symphony demands neat precise playing, violent changes of mood, along sustained passages and great speed in the last movement.

The orchestra includes some thirty-two instrumentalists, strings, woodwinds, brass and percussion. The Concert mistress is Jennifer Law, a third-year B Mus student, who is a winner of a Kingston Symphony Association Scholarship, a regular member of the Kingston Symphony, and like most of the string players in the Chamber Orchestra, studies with a member of the Vaghy String Quartet.

The Queen's Chamber Orchestra is becoming familiar to audiences not only in the capacity of performing concerts in their own right, but also as the orchestral accompaniment for the vocal ensembles. This is the second year the orchestra has been directed by Clifford Crawley.

Varsity girls go home with "13-1 Blues"

Hockey Gal's clobber Toronto

Susan Creighton

The hockey Gals finished off the first half of the season with a flourish as they clobbered the University of Toronto "Blues" 13-1. This was the first time they had met Toronto this year and such an easy victory was not expected as Toronto has had quite a strong team in the past (of course, Marg (Flossie) Bartlett was back on our side this time).

The Gals had a little difficulty in getting started, but they showed much improvement over past games by skating hard early into the second period. Sanda (Zsa-Zsa) Statten, who also scored in last week's game against McMaster, started the second period scoring on a beautiful shot taken from fairly close to the net. This had Queen's on their feet and before the period was over, eight goals had been notched for Queen's with no sign of a struggle from the opposition. Four of these scores were attained by Sue Thompson who, at the end of the game, had a total of eight points to her credit - 5 goals and 3 assists. Janean (Big G) Gerow, Debbie (Crip) Adams and Kathy (Woody) Wood also scored in this period.

The last part of the game saw Queen's shooting at the net a lot more than they had been in previous games. They outshot Toronto 31-15 and were obviously well-rewarded for their efforts. The remaining goals were scored by Jane Shorten, Cathy Eberts, Janean (Big G) Gerow and Anne (Pepsi) Symes (More would have been scored if Sue MacGregor hadn't been sitting out the game with a broken foot).

The Gals don't have any more games until after Christmas but they'll keep on practicing so their fans won't be disappointed. By the way, the team wishes to express a special thanks to all those who came out to watch, and a special, special thanks to those who tried themselves out doing Oil Thighs. Tanks youse guys!!

B-ball Golden Gals out-hustle Toronto team

Friday night the Queen's Golden Gals out-hustled Toronto 53-38. Once again the defensive effort won the game. There were endless turnovers and steals which added to the overall dominance by Queen's. Top scorers included Sue Gillies and Donna Roman while Kim Headford hit the boards extremely well as our top rebounder.

Our young team (half rookies) is starting to settle nicely. It takes time to become familiar with each other's style and to start to think as a unit, but each game gets better and better. Enthusiasm on the bench as well as on the floor also increases with each game and this was extremely evident at Friday's game against T.O.

Our record is now 4 wins and 1 loss, and we are finishing off this half of the season next weekend with games against McMaster and Waterloo.

To the fans who have helped us through the first half - thank you and see you next year.

Synchro

This past weekend, Queen's Golden Legs Synchro Swim Team again won the eastern sectional competition held at McGill. The other competing universities were U. of T., York and McGill. Queen's placed well in all events, accumulating an overall total of 46 points, ahead of McGill with 27 points, U. of T. with 25.5 pts and York with 24.

In the solo competition Diane Edgerly placed second with 67.3, tied with Celine Valois of McGill. Wendy White, placed next with 65.3 points. First and second places in duet competition were taken by Queen's team Celeste Jennings and Karen Russell. Queen's undefeated duet champions again placed first with 68.3 points followed closely by Janet Fix and Mary Pullan with 68 points.

In figures competition Queen's placed 3rd, 4th and 5th represented by Diane Edgerly, Celeste Jennings and Mary Pullan.

Finally, in the team event Diane Edgerly, Erica Geddes, Celeste Jennings, Kathy Lammer, Sandi Landell, Andrea Newmark, Karen Russell and Wendy White led with 66 points, followed by McGill with 61 points, U. of T. with 57 points and York with 54 points.

Much appreciation goes to our sub Jeanie Hughes, who assisted the team throughout the meet in many ways, manager Nayda Cole and coach Madeline Praelka.

The Queen's Journal, Tuesday, November 30, 1976

Queen's women's squash team overwhelms all competition

Queen's women's squash team completely overwhelmed all competition at the Queen's Invitational tournament last Saturday. The only problem was that the competition was a little less than challenging, as Queen's won every match that they played, losing only two games in twenty-three out-of-five game matches. York University finished far behind with twelve matches won, last year's OWIAA champion Waterloo ended up in third, followed by University of Toronto and McMaster.

The Queen's team consisted of Sandra Harris, Jana Sawynok, Joann Price, Jane Forbes-Roberts, and Roma Steele. The Queen's no. 2 player, Jana, was absolutely devastating in allowing only six points to be scored against her in twelve games. One of the games taken from Queen's was counted by Pat Eastale, wife of the Queen's men's coach Ron Eastale, as a sub for a missing York player. The other game against Queen's was scored by the York no. 5, who lulled Roma Steele to sleep by losing the first two games 9-1, 9-1, before making an all out effort to take the third game 10-9. Roma woke up and finished the match off 9-0 in the fourth game.

Queen's coach Jan Longhurst, while pleased to win so convincingly, would have preferred to have her players challenged somewhat more. She in fact suggested that she might split her team evenly to enter two teams in future events. However, McMaster had sent its second team to this event, while their first team played another tournament in Toronto. There is a chance that Western could have a stronger team than those at Queen's this weekend, but Queen's would have to be favoured to win the OWIAA championship this year.

Grapplers hard fought

by Alex Faseruk

After just five years of existence, the Ryerson open has emerged as one of the toughest tournaments in Canada. The Golden Grapplers this weekend fought many very hard matches and were able to come away with moderate success. The tournament was held on Saturday, November 27 in Toronto. It attracted 190 wrestlers in the 12 weight classes. In every weight class there was at least one national champion present, many of whom represented Canada at the last Olympics.

Coach Roy Worthington was the only wrestler for Queen's to place within the top three as he managed a second place finish in the Heavyweight Class. Worthington lost his first match to WYATT WISHART, last year's national junior champion. Wishart, from Lakehead University, was confronted with a very tough match defeating Worthington by an 8-3 margin. Roy was then able to shake off the loss and defeat the rest of his opponents to clinch his second place finish. The second place finish by Worthington is only the second time that a Queen's wrestler has managed to crack the top two. The last person to finish that high was ROB BEAMISH back in 1972.

Two wrestlers for Queen's managed to win two matches. At 150 lbs., rookie RICK TURTON was able to pin his first two opponents until he lost to EGON BEILER. Beiler is the defending Commonwealth and Pan Am American Games gold medalist and represented Canada at both the 1972 and 1976 Olympics. Without an unfortunate draw Turton would probably have finished higher in his weight class.

CHRIS EARREL, 142 lbs., also managed to pin two of his opponents. Farrel was eliminated when he lost a match by a mere one point. Winning one match for Queen's were DEL DEMONTE, CHRIS PADDISON and MIKE MOGGGRIDGE. Mogggridge fought well for the day. His lost came at the hands of ALBERT VENDETTI from Western. Vendetti is an exceptionally good wrestler who was an Olympic team alternate. Del Demonte's defeat came at the hands of TOM BETHUNE from Guelph who is the defending C.I.A.U. champion at 177 lbs. Queen's wrestler's had some fairly bad draws for the day. Had the draws been better, more wrestlers from Queen's may have placed within the top three.

The calibre of the wrestling was so exceptional this year that GORD BERTIE failed to win the 134 lb weight class. Bertie is a very experienced wrestler who has won the WORLD CUP OF WRESTLING and finished third in the 1975 World Championship and sixth in the 1972 Olympics. He, however, lost to Mike Barry, another Canadian Olympian.

Queen's wrestlers will now be out of action until after Christmas. The first two scheduled meets of the new year are the McMaster Open Jan. 8 and the Queen's Open Jan. 15.

Every once in a while Queen's Wrestlers come up with an extraordinary performance which does not occur on the mats. At the 1975 O.U.A.A. championship, Queen's wrestlers proved that they were the best snowball in the province after they successfully routed every other team in a snowball free for all in the McMaster parking lot. This year Queen's wrestlers were out to demonstrate their eating abilities at an "All You Can Eat" spaghetti dinner. As was expected Del Demonte had no problem leading the way with nine plates.

Waterpolo championships:

Disappointing finish for Gaels

by Brian Clarke

In the wake of a disappointing finish in the Ontario University Athletic Association Water Polo Championship at the Queen's swimming pool Saturday, there was at least one consolation for the Golden Gaels.

Richard Crew, an eighteen-year-old Queen's freshman, was that consolation. While the Queen's University Golden Gaels finished in fourth place of the four teams competing in the OUA A finals, Crew was awarded the trophy for the outstanding goalie in the competition.

McMaster University Marauders won the championship for the eighth consecutive year by defeating the University of Toronto Blues 8-6 in the final.

Queen's fell behind early in its first game of the finals against the Marauders, and the Gaels never really were able to get back on track. After being thumped 12-3 by McMaster, the Gaels lost the consolation championship 11-6 to the University of Western Ontario Mustangs.

Just the four teams, Queen's, McMaster, Toronto, and Western competed in the final, representing the two top teams from the OUA A Eastern and Western Sections.

Tied 2-2 at the end of the first period, it was an extremely close championship game. McMaster only led Toronto 5-4 at the end of the second period, and 6-5 by the finish of the third.

Top scorer for the Gaels in the tournament was Mitch Dent with five goals, two against McMaster, and three in the game with Western.

Other scorers for Queen's were Peter Trebuss with three goals, all against Western, and Mike Fox with one in the contest with McMaster.

Although the Gaels didn't pull off the upset victory many had been hoping for, their record this season has been quite respectable. Queen's was awarded the Canadian University Challenge Cup as the most improved team and for best sportsmanship.

Even though the OUA A league has now come to a close for the Gaels for another season, they're not going to stop playing water polo. Coach Bertler has plans to enter two teams in the Ottawa Valley Water Polo League.

Beyond this year, the Gaels can look towards having another strong team next year. Most of the team will be back, and with a championship goalie in net they can be expected to field another very competitive team.

Queen's Fencing Gals first

by Deborah Christian

Part East 1, the first sectional tournament of the OWIAA Fencing season, was held at McGill on Saturday. The Queen's team, consisting of Rosemary Knight, Sharon Mitchum, Mariam Niamir, Mary-Jane Baldwin, and Mary Jane Henderson, took first place over Carleton and McGill. The Gaels defeated second place Carleton 9-7 and McGill 10-6.

The Queen's team can also boast of having three top fencers, as Rosemary Knight captured the individual spotlight, with only two losses out of eleven bouts, Mary Jane Henderson took third place with only three losses and Mariam Niamir came sixth. Second place went to a Carleton girl with three losses but a better ratio of hits scored than received than Mary Jane.

The Queen's Fencers have shown quite an improvement in their performance so far in the season; third in the McGill Invitational, and now leaders going into the second OWIAA sectional to be held Feb. 5.

Special thanks go to Manager Viv Ropchan who not only mothers us but smoothers with her quick-witted and well-timed humour.

Ottawa wins Grey Cup thriller

In one of the most entertaining Grey Cup games in many a year the Ottawa Roughriders scored with only twenty seconds remaining to edge a very tough Saskatchewan Roughrider team by a score of 23-20.

In the first half Schenley award winner Ron Lancaster picked apart Ottawa's "deep four" defence with deadly accurate short passes to enable the Westerners to overcome an early 10-0 deficit and take a 17-10 lead into the dressing room at the half. Mazurak and Richardson scored second quarter majors for Saskatchewan while Hatanaka, a rookie from York U., ran home a punt 75 yards with a sensational return for Ottawa in the opening quarter.

All the scoring was done by homebrews with Tony Gabriels clutch catch of Tom Clement's pass in the endzone in the final minute being the most dramatic as Saskatchewan's defence proved to be the weaker in the pass when it counted.

Volleyball teams play well

Referee appears dismayed that York were up for match with Gaels

by Jill Calder & Dave Tod

The Volleyball Gals seem to be surpassing their objectives of the season. The squad from last year have left this year's young team in the OWIAA elite league containing the six top teams in Ontario. The objective for this year's team is to stay in that league and not get moved down to the OVA league which contains the other university teams and club teams about the province. As of last week, the Gals had defeated the teams from Windsor and York. The play of this past weekend was of the same high calibre. The squad from McMaster fell to Queen's determined defense. With only a slight faltering in Queen's power of concentration in the third game, they were decidedly beaten in the best three of five by the fourth game.

Western (the national champs for several years now) was another story. The pace of the games were quick and full of surprise saves, keeping both coaches and the audience on the edge of their seats. The girls from Western won three games straight, but they did not win easily. In the third game, the Queen's gals held off the game point for six rotations as they continued to work on their own score. The audience support was great and greatly appreciated by the girls.

Next week the team will be in Waterloo for a shot at bettering their present position from third to second in the elite league.

The scores for the matches were as follows: (best three of five)
McMaster: 15-4, 15-10, 8-15, 15-9
Western: 9-15, 3-15, 11-15

During the weekend Queen's men's volleyball team hosted squads from York and RMC. In the morning, the cadets from RMC were beaten handily by the Gaels 15-4, 15-6, 15-8. In the afternoon Queen's was defeated by York three games to one. Perhaps the Christmas break will prove beneficial for the rapidly approaching playoffs.

B-ballers are "Xed"

by Pete Still

November 26th and 27th saw Queen's Men's Basketball Team playing in the Annual Naismith Basketball Tournament in Waterloo. The tourney was an eight team double elimination affair including such b-ball powers as the Calgary Dinos, Laurentian, Waterloo, McMaster and St. F. of X. from New Brunswick.

In their opening contest, Queen's ran up against a tough competitor in St. F. of X. who helded three Americans in their starting line up. Veteran Derek Swinnard led the Gaels into battle, but the experienced X-men managed to pull away in the final ten minutes to make the score, St. F. of X. 85 and Queen's 59.

The following morning Alberta dumped Queen's 91-76. The Gaels played an organized game, but only hit 29 percent from the foul line. The Queen's squad was down by only 42-36 at the half. The star for the red, blue and gold was Dave Dempster who hooped 17 points and grabbed down 14 rebounds. Coach Pete Smith felt that both St. F. of X. and Alberta Bears were very talented teams. He was also very impressed by two players of St. F. of X., Chris Price (a local talent from Kingston) and Doug Green who racked up 33 points against Queen's.

Scoring over the two tournament games for Queen's was Dave Dempster with 24 points, Henry Garbaty (22), Rookie Kim Carlton (18), Andy Boniwell (16), Bob Cooney (15), Lorenz Paulsen (6) and, Pete Lainey, Steve McCreedy and Mike Flenken with 2 points each.

MBA's "Stats A" wipe up in tough Toilette Bowl

Last Sunday morning Frank Tindall Field played host to a titanic struggle when the first year M.B.A.'s squared off to battle for the coveted Toilette Bowl. The confrontation among these giants of the Queen's sporting world was won by STATS Section "A" over STATS Section "B" by a 6-0 margin.

Although the game was played on a very muddy field, it was nevertheless great fun for all the participants. The sole scoring play of the game came when Rick Wright scampered for a 25 yard touchdown after picking off a Larry Small pass. STATS "A" came close to scoring another touchdown but were stopped on the STATS "B" goal line. The defenses on both teams were very tough. Perhaps coach Hargraves should have scouted the game.

Al Cibulak of Section "A" was probably the game's outstanding player turning in a fine two way performance. On offense, he lead the

"A" stream at quarterback. Defensively, he was also able to stop many of the STATS "A" attacks.

The game was not confined to male M.B.A.'s. Some of the gentler sex took part. For STATS "A" Debbie Scofield caught a pass, Janet Isaac and Jennifer Camelford were really tough competitors on the line. For the B Stream Liz Buckingham displayed her endurance by taking and dishing out some extremely hard blocks.

The M.B.A.I. class would like to thank Doug Renwick and Jim Fleming for donating their time and reffing the First Annual M.B.A. Toilette Bowl.

The major problem confronting the M.B.A.I. executive is where to locate a trophy case in which to store this prestigious Bowl. Also, any donations for Sani-Flush would be greatly appreciated.

Badminton Gals tops

Laurel McIntyre

The Queen's women's badminton team continued their victorious ways last weekend by winning the Part 1 East Sectional tournament in Toronto.

Queen's ended up with 21 points, beating U. of T.'s 19, Guelph's 13, and Ryerson's 1 point. This puts Queen's in top spot in the east, and possibly overall, depending on the outcome of the west sectional also played last weekend. Western is the top contender in that tournament.

Bev Kosky and Lindee Stemp led the way by winning all their respective singles, and their doubles matches. Diana Edwards also won her three singles matches, and together with Gayle Raycraft, lost only to the Guelph's 2nd doubles team. Betsy Carey and Sandy Koerner provided more singles and doubles wins. All tallied, Queen's won 21 out of a possible 27 matches.

Teams from the nine universities involved will be divided into two flights; the top five going into the A flight, the other four into the B flight. Queen's is expected to be in the A flight.

The women's success can be attributed to fine talent, regular practices, and Bernie Houghton's invaluable coaching. Until after Christmas, the team will but practices to Tuesday nights only. Then, they will continue regular 3-nights-a-week practices in preparation for January's tournament at Brock University in St. Catharines, where undoubtedly the women will put in another great performance and gain yet another victory.

Oops!

Vern Myers, editor of a financial newsletter, once told his readers that it was a good idea to "keep your money in a safety box in your own backyard" instead of in a bank. He followed his own advice by putting $35,000 worth of gold coins in a barrel under a pile of manure and horse blankets, and then hiding it in his barn.

Later, after he had forgotten about his horde, and the barrel and contents had begun to stink, Myers sent the whole lot to the dump. Without checking the contents first.

Luckily for Myers, the coins were found several days later by a family salvaging metal and bottles from the dump.

Polysar paybacks

Polysar Ltd. still kicks back payments to its European customers because it doesn't see anything wrong with the practice, company spokesmen explained.

An investigation was ordered by Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau in 1973 when he was informed of their actions by the former Auditor-General A. Maxwell Henderson. But the policy continued despite doubts on the part of the Prime Minister as to whether it was legal.

Polysar President Ian Rush said his firm gave cash rebates for volume purchases, but has never paid bribes to anyone, anywhere in the world. Another company spokesman said the company invoiced customers at a standard list price. If customers bought more than certain quantities over a year, at the end of the year they got rebates.

However, one experienced foreign investor said Polysar ought to have been suspicious of being made party to a tax and currency law fiddle.

Civil war possible

A black African group says Britain and certain African states have agreed to back nationalist leader, Joshua Nkomo, as Prime Minister of Rhodesia's interim government. Officials of Bishop Abel Muzorewa's African National Council said civil war might erupt if anyone became prime minister without being elected to the post.

The charge coincided with a break in the deadlock over setting a date for majority rule. The deadline for completion of the legal independence process is March 1, 1978. The conference is expected to get down to crucial issues when it reconvenes.

Ottawa wins!

The Ottawa Roughriders gained a last-minute victory over Saskatchewan on a touchdown pass from Tom Clements to Tony Gabriel with 20 seconds left in the game. The final score was 23-20. All points were scored by Canadian players.

It looked like Ottawa was out of luck when they were stopped by a great defensive play on the one yard line with a minute left. However, their defense held and it took Clements only two plays to reach the end zone.

Tom Clements won the award as the outstanding player of the game, while Tony Gabriel was the outstanding Canadian.

PM wants referendum

Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau said Thursday that English Canadians should have a say in whether they want Quebec to remain in Confederation. Even though he did not commit himself to a national referendum, Mr. Trudeau said such a referendum might show Quebecers they are still wanted by the rest of Canada.

The comments came in a press conference after Mr. Trudeau's speech to the nation on Thursday. During the press conference he remarked that "the whole concept of dividing Canada is unthinkable and politically unworkable." He also said that if the majority of Canadians wanted Quebec to stay in, and were willing to act as they did, then separatism wouldn't be a problem.

Plan to disarm militia

The Syrian army is making plans to disarm hostile private armies. The collection of artillery is an important step in consolidating the truce, as previous ceasefires have disintegrated under anonymous long-range shelling.

The Arab peace plan specifies that only heavy weapons must be given up by the combatants. Lebanese and Syrian commanders of the truce force have been acting as go-betweens among the civil factions, but no detailed plan has been worked out yet.

Tuition fees up

Harry Parrott, Ontario's Minister of Colleges and Universities, finally came out with the announcement last Thursday that tuition fees will be going up next fall. Fees will increase by $100 for university students and $75 for community college students. There have been no increases in tuition fees since 1972.

There will be an extra $13-million in the fund for student grants and loans next year as well. Dr. Parrott said that any university student receiving a Government loan or grant will get an extra $100 to cover the rise in tuition.

Ontario Federation of Students chairman, Murray Miskin, said that the fee increase will be opposed. Student council presidents across Ontario met on the weekend to decide exactly how they would oppose the increase.

Gas prices down

Imperial Oil has lowered the price of gas at its stations on highways 401 and 404 by five cents. The Ontario government negotiated a drop in the percentage of gross revenues to be paid to the province, in return for which the gas company lowered its gas prices for consumers.

Transportation Minister James Snow said that the government had been in touch with other gas companies with stations on highways between Windsor and Toronto, and Barrie and the Quebec border. He is optimistic that these other companies will be soon lowering their prices as Imperial Oil did.

Area arrest

Dr. Mervyn Richard Whelan, 27, a doctor working at the Family Medicine Centre at Hotel Dieu Hospital, was arrested Wednesday and charged Thursday in Belleville provincial court with the murder of his wife Marilyn, a 27-year-old public school teacher in Kingston. Mrs. Whelan drowned in the Trent Canal near Glen Miller on September 25. She was hiking with her husband, and she fell into the water upstream from a dam. Her body was washed over the dam and found a week later by OPP divers after a long search.

No witnesses to the drowning have come forward, and some unanswered questions concerning the incident are prompting an investigation by the Criminal Investigation Branch of the OPP.

Wintario grants

A total of $165,971 has been awarded from the proceeds of the Wintario Lottery in the form of grants to local projects in Frontenac County.

The Kingston YW-YMCA will receive financial help for alterations and expansions which are to include a new swimming pool, tennis courts and exercise facilities. The Kingston Public Library will receive $8,000 to buy Canadian and multi-lingual material and books.

Grants have also been awarded to the Kingston Community Ballet Association, the Collins Bay Water Ski Club, the Kingston Township Voyageurs Junior B Hockey Club, the Rob Roy Pipe and Highland Dancers of Kingston, and the Wolfe Island Community Centre. Board Two individuals also received grants to assist in various travel expenses necessary to attend conferences.

Odeon Theatre

Renovations are in progress at the Odeon Theatre on Princess Street, but local trade union members are conducting an information picket in protest over hiring practices on the job. The protesting unions are members of the Quinte-St. Lawrence Building Trades Council. They are unhappy over the contractors hiring out-of-town labor.

The general contractor, Mr. Dennis Happy of M.S. Happy General Contractors of Hamilton, is a non-union worker and uses non-union labor and out-of-town workers on the job as part of his non-discriminatory practices. The Kingston union members object because their affiliates have at present a 25 per cent unemployment rate.

Move our constitution to back burner for now Lougheed tells crowd

by Rob Reynolds

"I think we could put the issue of the patriation of the constitution on the back burner for awhile", according to Alberta Premier Peter Lougheed. This represented the only new insight that Premier Lougheed presented to the Queen's audience last Monday night at Dunning Hall.

Referring to himself as "a blue-eyed Arab" the Progressive Conservative premier presented a case for a decentralization of federal powers. In this regard Premier Lougheed asserted, "This is a great country but it would be greater if the West was stronger and there is little chance of a stronger Western Canada unless the provincial governments are stronger."

Premier Lougheed first broached the subject of the new Quebec government by stating, "It's not just Quebec that wants a higher degree of decision making at the provincial level."

At a press conference after the speech, the Premier would not commit himself on the question of more autonomy for Quebec saying only that "We'll wait on that."

In making a case against Central Canada, Premier Lougheed noted that "51 percent of the manufacturing is in Ontario and 26 percent is in Quebec." He later issued a warning to Central Canada stating, "I urge that Central Canadian's realize that changes must be made."

Despite his criticisms of the distribution of power between the two senior levels of government, Lougheed left little doubt that he is a federalist. When the Premier was asked about his stand on equalization payment to the poorer provinces, he asserted, "We wouldn't back away from that at all."

Elaborating on the topic of Canadian unity, Premier Lougheed stated his disagreement with the policies of the Alberta Independence Association referring to how he had opposed their programmes prior to the provincial election of March 26, 1975 but still managed to win a resounding majority.

The Alberta premier joked about Alberta's strong bargaining position at federal-provincial meetings saying, "I wear the black hat at the conferences." With an eye towards relieving his situation at those conferences Premier Lougheed noted, "the best thing for Canada would be if oil was discovered off the east coast."

In a more serious tenor, Premier Lougheed discussed the economic problems that Canada faces with specific reference to poor productivity and the balance of payments deficits the result of which, he stated, "will be a weaker Canadian dollar."

Referring to Alberta's economy the Premier declared "We are far too dependent upon selling off our depletable resources." He continued on, making a case for increased secondary industry in Alberta. Premier Lougheed also informed the audience that Canada's last oil discovery was in Alberta in 1966.

The importance of the United States to the future of the Canadian economy was also stressed by Lougheed. The "blue-eyed Arab", called for improved communications between the two countries inferring perhaps, more trade.

With the intent of refuting Canadian economic nationalists, Premier Lougheed noted with respect to the U.S., "Sure we're important to them but we have to realize they're important to us."

Grad stipends increased, awards changed for '77-8

TORONTO-[CUP] Ontario university and college student leaders will present petitions opposing the recent tuition fee increase to Minister of Colleges and Universities Harry Parrott on Dec. 10.

An Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) emergency plenary here Nov. 27 decided to use petitions as their initial strategy because, according to OFS Executive Assistant Peter MacDonald, there were fears the increase would be much higher than the $100 announced Nov. 25. Therefore delegates were not sure how students would react.

Parrott has called two meetings with student union presidents for Dec. 10, one for community colleges and one for universities. OFS members decided to ask for one large meeting and to present petitions circulated at post-secondary institutions, high schools and among the general public, MacDonald said.

Each student union, said MacDonald, will approach its Board of Governors or Senate asking that they refuse to charge differential fees, to be implemented starting in January 1977. Laurentian University Senate has already rejected the two-tier system and the University of Toronto is considering rejection.

MacDonald said OFS expects an announcement soon on the 1977-78 Ontario Student Assistance Program

OFS petitions against higher fees

by Paul Finkel

The Ministry of Universities and Colleges has made a number of changes in the Ontario Graduate Scholarship Programme effective as of the 1977-78 school year:

- 1) The 10 percent quota on landed immigrants has been removed but "to ensure that scholarships are only awarded to those students who have made a solid commitment to this country, certain residency requirements have been instituted."
- 2) The stipend for the scholarship has been increased to $1,400 per term or $4,200 per year.
- 3) Institutional awards in Universities with doctoral programmes have been abolished.
- 4) The total number of awards available will be 945. Of these, 45 will be awarded to institutional nominees, and 50 of the remaining 900 awards will be made available to student visa holders and landed immigrants who do not meet the residency requirements pertaining to #1 of the above.

5) Holders of scholarships will be permitted to hold other awards up to $1,000 and accept research assistantships or part-time teaching or demonstrating appointments that do not interfere with their status as full-time students.

These changes resulted from recommendations forwarded to the Ministry by the Ontario Council on University Affairs.

Prior to the complete opening of Graduate studies awards to both Canadian and Landed Immigrant status students, 90 percent of the 1,000 awards were reserved for Canadian citizens only. The OCUA disapproved of this policy on the grounds that it not only "undetermined" the Programme's purpose of rewarding academic excellence, by restricting competition, but also on the basis that "such discrimination might be viewed as departing from the spirit of the Ontario Human Rights Code."

While scholarship stipends have been increased by 12 percent, the OCUA had recommended that they be increased by 20 percent to $1,500 per term, or $4,500 per year, noting that "a sizeable gap had emerged between OGS and federal stipends", the existence of which weakened the OGS Programme in its efforts "to encourage excellence in graduate studies."

The criteria that Dr. Parrott cited in explaining his stipend increase of only 12 percent were, "the continuing climate of economic restraint, the anti-inflation guidelines and government cut-backs in other areas."

Information regarding the newly imposed residency requirements can be obtained by contacting the School of Graduate Studies and Research.

What gov't priorities?

For the first time in live years, tuition fees for Ontario university students have been increased. Next year it will cost $100 more to attend university in this province. According to Dr. Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, this represents an annualized average increase over five years of 3.2 per cent as compared with the climb in the consumer price index of 8.1 per cent over those same five years.

Such are the unpleasant facts and students can be expected to grumble somewhat at the prospect of paying more. Still the government leaders of the opposition parties in Ontario do not seriously entertain the prospect of encountering much student opposition. Predictably, the Ontario Federation of Students has voiced its dismay at the fee increase, but commendably, it is waiting to gauge the general student reaction before deciding upon a definite course of action. Moreover, student council presidents will have the opportunity to discuss the situation with Dr. Parrott on December 10th when they are scheduled to meet with him.

From the resulting dialogue, clear government and OFS positions on tuition fees for the coming years might hopefully emerge. The OFS demand for free tuition was conceived during, and was better suited to, more prosperous times. Clearly a reassessment is now needed; students at Queen's have already said as much in a referendum held last month.

Nonetheless, the Ontario government should be given to understand that students in the province have not relinquished their desire that all financial barriers for those with appropriate academic qualifications be removed. This goal is supported by the Ontario government.

Students are well aware that this era of financial restraints has imposed certain restrictions upon government funding of social services. We recognize that the government must allocate the financial resources at its disposal according to certain priorities, some of which are more pressing in terms of general need than post secondary education. What students should demand, however, is that a well reasoned policy delineating and explaining these priorities be made public. Students are by no means insensitive to the numerous financial demands placed upon the public purse. Still diminishing the ideal of universal accessibility should not be made without knowledge of that for which such a sacrifice was made.

The OFS is understandably dissatisfied with the Ontario government's justification of the fee increase. The government is purportedly aiming for a situation in which the student would pay roughly 20 per cent of the cost of his university education. Although this year the corresponding figure was 14.4 per cent rising to 16.1 per cent next year, that the government should consider the increase a positive step towards the ostensibly arbitrary goal of 20 per cent can hardly be expected to reassure students that the government has their best interests at heart.

On December 10th the student presidents and the OFS should ask for the rationale behind the government's priorities. Should they be forthcoming, the OFS consult with its constituents and reassess its position on the issue of tuition.

Impressive Albertan

Alberta's Peter Lougheed aroused the interest of many students through his speech on Monday night. He brought home to us very clearly the disillusionment of the West with Eastern Canada. Alberta is presently a major economic force within the Canadian economy, said Lougheed, but he lamented that this situation is not reflected in the distribution of political power in Canada. The Premier went on to say that regrettably, Alberta's economic position is precariously based on the exploitation of dwindling natural resources.

Preserving Alberta as an economic force within the Canadian context helps to maintain the balance in Confederation. Historically, political power has resided in the central provinces. Greater political autonomy will give Alberta the opportunity to diversify its industry for its continued prosperity. While recognizing Premier Lougheed's desire to develop Alberta now while the resources are readily available, it was comforting to note his forceful commitment to equalization payments which constitute such an integral part of the balance of prosperity in Canada.

Alberta's new strategy

by David Bond

There is a general recognition that Alberta has not much political power. "But Alberta has a strong negotiating position because of its natural resources," says Premier Lougheed. Mr. Lougheed spoke last Monday afternoon to an audience of Queen's Commerce students on the issue of federal-provincial relations and more specifically on his economic strategy to put Alberta's current prosperity on a foundation that will survive the depletion of the province's petroleum resources.

Mr. Lougheed added "that as Canada moves into a new post-control period a higher degree of cooperation between the federal and provincial governments is necessary. Lougheed believes, however, that Canada must accept a basic shift in the division of powers, not only to accommodate the aspirations of Quebec, but those of Western and Atlantic Canada as well.

As Premier Lougheed sees it, the most urgent problem facing Canada is the divisive effects of the federal government's efforts to erode provincial rights. Lougheed is chiefly concerned with what many Albertans see as a federal takeover of provincial rights to natural wealth, especially its crude oil and natural gas resources.

Alberta's resource base, along with the fortunate surge in the value of oil since the rise of OPEC, has given the province a prosperity unparalleled in Canada. Based as it is on a depleting resource, the current Alberta prosperity has, the premier said, "a certain precariousness about it." "We could be a have-not province within ten years," he adds.

"We have had no major oil discovery in Canada since the Rainbow discovery in Northwest Alberta in 1966." Also the reserve situation in oil is pretty bleak and declining rapidly. The Premier added that "frontier exploration and East Coast exploration has been disappointing."

One of the objectives of the Lougheed government has been the development in Alberta of a petrochemical industry. The start of construction this year on an ethylene plant near Red Deer indicates some progress for this policy, designed for consumption of the province's raw materials within Alberta.

Alberta's young petrochemical industry, however, may be headed for rough waters as a slower economic growth rate in the major economies and because of the massive expansion around the Petrosar complex at Sarnia, Ontario, fed with Alberta crude oil. That complex is likely to win most of the domestic market, leaving Alberta to look for export sales, across a tariff wall in the United States.

Lougheed asserts that Alberta's objective "is not large scale increases in population or smokestacks." "We're more looking for preserving the way of life we have but diversifying our economy, so we're less dependent on the sale of unprocessed resources."

AMS opposes fee hike

by Chris Hall

Despite student opposition to the principle of free tuition as expressed in the November opinion poll, AMS Vice-presidents Paul Steep and Kathy Wood re-introduced a motion calling for Outer Council to re-affirm its support for the principle of free tuition. The motion, presented at the Outer Council meeting Thursday Dec. 2, requests that Outer Council finally make a decision on the matter. When contacted by the Journal, Kathy Wood explained the purpose behind the motion. "The policy on the books is in support of free tuition, and even though the students opposed it, we are not legally bound to their decision. By forcing AMS Outer Council to make a decision, we will have to either change the policy or leave it."

The agenda also contained a number of motions concerning the recent announcement of tuition hikes by the Ontario Ministry of Colleges and Universities. A number of these motions direct the AMS President to write letters to Harry Parrott, Stuart Smith and Stephen Lewis. These letters will indicate not only the opposition and extreme displeasure of the AMS to these hikes, but will also point out the futility of such measures. "and that the AMS takes particular exception to the evident fact that the increased

Oh, shit!

A freak storm descended on the typically sunny city of Kingston, dumping roughly two centimetres of snow on the highways and streets, throwing them into chaos.

The storm delayed delivery of the Queen's Journal from Precott by twenty four hours, turning the Tuesday edition into our first Wednesday edition in years.

"Hell of Auschwitz" must never reoccur

"The missionaries of the early Christian church, in effect, said to the Jews, 'you have no right to live among us as Jews', and maligned their religion. The secular rulers, a thousand years later said, 'you have no right to live among us' and expelled them. The Nazis said 'you have no right to live' and murdered them." This "escalation" has been a fact "throughout Jewish history."

So said Professor Emil J. Fackenheim during an address on Tuesday, the fourth Donald Mathers Memorial Lecture. Fackenheim, the first non-Christian to give one of these lectures, was born in Germany. Educated in Berlin and Aberdeen he fled the Nazis in 1938 and finally secured his PhD in Philosophy from the University of Toronto, where he has been a professor since 1948. He holds two honorary Doctor of Laws degrees, a Doctor of Divinity from St. Andrew's College in Saskatchewan and is a Fellow of the Royal Society of Canada.

Fackenheim began his lecture "Jews and Christians after Auschwitz, or Theology on Trial" with three stories of Nazi atrocities in Poland during September of 1939. He utilized such grim pictures lest people lose sight of the actual events by merely considering general principle, in other words, seeing the Nazi regime as simply a manifestation of the demonic.

He emphasized that "for the Nazi soldiers the Jews were not human but vermin and one does not murder vermin, one exterminates them." This view fails to account for the mindless hatred of Jews for the Nazis so the "Jews were seen as devils and there can be passion in exterminating devils."

To speak of the period of the Second World War "as a unique event in history is a cop-out. Something led up to it and consequences were derived from it." To take 1933-45 out of history is simply inadequate. So we have the escalation through history of the "philological absurdity of anti-Semitism." Looking at it from an historical point of view "I could almost love" the earlier persecutors "as opposed to the acts of Eichman." The early persecutors "tried to save Jewish souls at the expense of Jewish bodies. Eichman tried to humiliate Jewish souls."

Hatred of Jews was based on a mass of contradictions. "The right wing said Jews were revolutionaries and Bolsheviks. The left wing said Jews were reactionary capitalists. The liberals disapproved of our particularistic desire to survive. The Nazis opposed our lack of particularization in mixing with German nation." The final step in this escalation was to say "it's in the blood. You don't have to do anything to be a criminal. Thus the murder of one million children can be seen as a punishment." The Nazi Reich was "the only regime in history with only one purpose - the murderous hatred of Jews. When the 'thousand year' Reich collapsed, nothing remained."

"The children of Auschwitz died for the faith of their grandparents." Proof of a single Jewish grandparent was sufficient for arrests to be made. The Holocaust has therefore left the Jewish people with a paradox.

"Should they expose their children to the threat of another Holocaust or should they let the 4,000 years of Jewish history die. Either decision hands Hitler a posthumous victory." The answer is that the "devil must be resisted. The hell of Auschwitz must never recur. This is the reason for the state of Israel."

Western pays partial OFS fees-

LONDON [CUP]-The student government at the University of Western Ontario, after upholding the results of a recent Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) referendum on their campus, agreed to pass along $6000 to the provincial students' organization, Nov. 10.

OFS chairman, Murray Miskin, and treasurer, T-Jay Waldo, argued that since Western's membership in the federation can only be terminated at next year's annual general meeting, the University Student Council (USC) was legally obligated to pay a full year's membership fees.

When Western originally joined OFS several years ago they successfully argued that because they had joined between general meetings they were not obligated to pay fees until after the next meeting. This year's council adamantly rejected the concept of meeting to meeting membership.

The council decided that because they'd received the full range of services up to the time they decided to drop out of OFS they would pay fees on a pro-rated basis.

After the meeting both OFS representatives attacked the USC for what they called, "callous disregard for Western's commitment made in June."

Miskin said that the OFS may attempt legal action against the USC. The decision will be made at the next OFS executive meeting.

Miskin denied other universities are also considering withdrawing from OFS.

"We're not worried about that at all. The feedback we've received is that while many universities express regret at Western's leaving, they also reconfirmed support for the OFS."

Ont gov't ignores student housing, jobs-

TORONTO [CUP]-Long range planning on student employment and housing is being ignored by the government, David Warner, NDP member of the Ontario legislature and chief opposition critic of government education policies, said at a recent meeting at the University of Toronto.

"The issue of increased tuition fees is important and it is discussed in the legislature, but the larger student costs involve housing and unemployment - and they are being totally ignored."

Student housing, said Warner, should be seen in the light of the whole housing issue. Warner sees a solution to the problem in long term, low interest mortgage rates.

"It'll take the pressure off housing in the cities and provide cheaper and better housing for students."

Unemployment is another area the government ignores in long range planning, Warner charged. He is certain that the student unemployment rate will once again be around 20 per cent.

York students won't press charges-

TORONTO [CUP]-Legal proceedings will not be started against the university administration for increasing residence rents 13.5 per cent last May, an increase some have called illegal.

This was the result of a poll conducted two weeks ago in all undergraduate residences at York University. Out of 523 who responded to the poll, 317 called for an out of court settlement.

Due to an apparent failure to comply with legislation on the part of the administration, students could have pressed for rent rebates. Instead the bargaining committee will be pressing for concessions from the university administration.

Harry Knox, the administration's representative in the negotiations disagreed with student committee that the changes the committee wants are in the bag. "It hasn't been finalized yet, we're having another meeting this Friday," he said.

Another concession being sought by the student committee is a resurfacing of the Master's Residence Committee, giving it the power to determine rents and giving students 50 per cent of the bargaining committee's votes.

Euthanasia regular practice in Canada-

WINNIPEG [CUP]-Euthanasia, mercy killing, is now regularly practiced in Canada, Dr. David Skelton revealed at the University of Manitoba recently. Skelton is from the department of geriatrics at St. Boniface Hospital here.

Both active euthanasia, actually taking the life of a suffering patient, and passive euthanasia, not striving to maintain a life, are practiced, he said.

An example of active euthanasia would be administering "marginally high" doses of morphine to patients in great suffering. This can be defended on legal grounds while still producing the desired effect - a quick and painless death. Technically, it was pointed out, this is first degree murder.

Passive euthanasia is much more common. In consultation with relatives of the patient, a decision is reached on whether a terminally ill patient should be resuscitated upon suffering a relapse of any sort. A special notation on the patient's chart indicates that resuscitation is not to be undertaken should the patient be near death.

"We're all in favor of euthanasia," Skelton said, if the word is taken in its literal sense, meaning "good death." However, the question of exactly when, how or by whose decision euthanasia should be performed remains unanswered.

According to Skelton, the Canadian Medical Association has no formal position on euthanasia at present.

Canadian economy defies standard political science Carleton prof. says

by Anne Johnson

In order to understand the political economy of Canada, one must first understand the dynamics of federal-provincial relations, said Garth Stevenson of Carleton University, in a lecture given at Queen's on Monday, November 29. Marxian analysis, he stated, is geared towards unitary states and not federal systems, hence some attention should be given to the Canadian example. Contrary to the United States experience, the Canadian provinces have become more and more decentralized, primarily because of their control over their own natural resources.

In Canada, there is a tendency for class conflict to find expression through conflicts between the different levels of government as well as within each region. Stevens pointed out, however, that this phenomenon is not as prevalent today as it has been in the past. Now, he says, the nature of the system is for economic conflicts to occur within the ruling class. The provinces, said Stevenson, speak on behalf of the narrow interests of one section of the bourgeoisie, while the federal government speaks for the broader interests of the ruling class as a whole. He pointed out the recent example of the Alberta oil interests in conflict with the federal government.

Expanding on this, Stevenson said, "for the hundreds of politicians and the thousands of functionaries involved in one or the other level of governmentally promoting the acquisition of power and money by their level of government becomes an end in itself, even if at the same time it may objectively serve the interests of one or another segment of the ruling class."

Since Canada's system reflects the fragmented and regionalized nature of its economy, it presents a complex picture of collaboration and conflict that "seems to defy standard categories of political science."

Computing "breakthrough"

by Annette Nicholson

The director of the computing centre gave a demonstration, Thursday sponsored by the Senate Computing Committee, of a unique new computing system, which they are evaluating, in hopes of implementing it soon. At the presentation in Dupuis Auditorium the system was outlined, and spectators were able to use the two demonstrator models. It was explained how the new system will fit in with the computers Queen's already possesses.

Terry Wood, Systems Programmer, called the proposed system of mini-computers a "breakthrough in approach to student computing." He knows of no other university that has instituted such a system.

Normally, said Wood, a university has one large machine, which as user demands increase, is replaced by one yet larger and the old computer is scrapped. Queen's at the moment has two fairly large computers. The proposed plan is to buy several small, self-contained computers used by one student at a time. Queen's larger computers have up to 40 terminals open to students at one time.

Initially Queen's hopes to buy 15 to 20 mini-computers to be housed in Jeffery and Dupuis Halls. As user demands increase and the money becomes available Queen's will be able to add more machines.

The advantages of the system, said Wood, are that if one machine breaks down, the student need only move to another, and therefore availability is always high. The mini-computers do not need operators and would be available 24 hours a day. The system would also be easily expanded and the mini-computers are relatively inexpensive, while performing as efficiently as Queen's larger machines. The machines would be portable, approximately the size of a large television.

Students avert library disaster

by Annette Nicholson

There was a near disaster in the Math Library in Jeffrey Hall Wednesday afternoon, as a leak from a heating duct in the ceiling almost caused a flood. Quick action by 3 staff members and half a dozen students who were studying in the library at the time saved the books from water damage.

According to Phyllis Bray and Diane Nuttall, staff in charge of the library, if the books had been soaked, they would have to have been interleaved with paper towels and freeze dried, page by page. The cost would have been enormous.

Thanks to the cooperation of the students, said Bray and Nuttall, no damage was done and the mess was cleaned up within 45 minutes.

Devaluation will stimulate Canada

Gerry Lewarne

The recent devaluation of the Canadian dollar has caused many people to moan that Canada is going the way of Britain: down the drain. Nothing could be further from the truth. The devaluation will allow Canada to develop its own secondary industry.

The devaluation is good for Canada because our exports will be cheaper for Americans, Europeans and Japanese to buy. Theoretically, there should be an increase in the demand for Canadian goods because their price has gone down.

Now is the time for the federal government to take our manufacturing industries and shake them into a state of high production. Recent unemployment figures show that there are plenty of people looking for work and work in manufacturing is usually preferred to such occupations as mining and forestry. The unemployment figures don't really tell the whole story. There is an awful lot of machinery either not being used or running at half capacity. There are minimal costs to making it run at full capacity.

The important thing to remember when we begin all of this new production, is to produce goods which Canadians can make better than anybody else. As a country, we have high wages and therefore cannot compete with Japan or Taiwan when the goods being made involve the use of a lot of labour. We do have an advantage in commodities which require highly educated labour or machinery in comparison to most countries.

Instead of trying to exploit the advantages that Canada has, the federal government is protecting the clothing industry which requires a lot of labour. If we can get it at cheaper prices elsewhere, why are we wasting our dollars and our labour on an industry which is inefficient and has no chance for growth? The reason is short term political goals. Jean Chretien, the minister who announced the policy, did so because 65 percent of the clothing industry is in Quebec and he is buying votes.

What Chretien ought to be doing as Industry, Trade and Commerce Minister is phasing out inefficient industries and giving tax incentives to others. He should put fairly stringent requirements on the tax incentives. The companies should be Canadian and located in the same areas as the inefficient industries. Furthermore, the industries should use raw materials that are available in Canada. If a policy such as this was followed, we would have a lower proportion of foreign ownership in Canada, no dislocation of population, and we would start exploiting our resources instead of having someone else do it for us. Most important we would begin to close the gap between primary and secondary industry in this country.

If you still don't believe that Canada and Britain are going in different directions, consider the two economies. Britain lives and dies with its manufacturing sector. They have very few raw materials and no potential of ever having any. Canada, on the other hand, has a lot of raw materials and some potential for more, but little manufacturing industry.

The devaluation of the dollar could not have come at a better time. We do not have an awful lot of time before some of our more important resources, such as oil, run out. Hopefully, the devaluation will be the stimulus needed to kick us into gear. What we don't need now is myopic, short run, economic policy from somebody who is supposed to be a heavyweight in the federal Cabinet.

—by Paul Dalle-Molle—

Emotional simplicity

There was well-meant but misplaced emotionalism at the Toronto Star last weekend when it printed a front-page editorial entitled "Sleepwalking to Disaster". Although some of the Star's conclusions about the Quebec issue are acceptable, it has done a disservice to its readers by reducing the discussion of Canada's future to one topic: separation.

Quebec independence was described in the strongest possible terms, such as a "fatal step", a "national emergency" requiring a "Save Canada cabinet" to justify and effect a "Save Canada policy". From this vantage, the Star is profoundly misguided. It has lent the weight of Canada's largest-circulation daily to one emotional and obvious issue. If, as the Star wishes, the Canadian political scene remains obsessed with this issue, then indeed Canada will be "Sleepwalking to Disaster".

The Star should be concerned with getting itself and its readers out of the 1960's and into the 1980's as regards two greater issues: the economy and an energy policy. Canada had a balance-of-trade deficit of $5 billion in 1975. The fact is that Canada has concentrated on a traditional free-enterprise orientation to relieve the pressure. Most Canadians - especially the government and its backbone, the industry - are committed to an expansion of the production-consumption cycle to bring about a "recovery". It is as if GNP growth and the consumer society were ordained by nature!

That Canada lacks an energy policy is a source of embarrassment. Energy waste in Canada is fostered by the government, and only the barest effort is being made to alter the lavishness of the economy. If there ever was a case of "sleepwalking", this is it - not the French question, which has historically been the chief recurring theme in Canadian politics.

Why is there a phobia in English Canada about Quebec nationalism? Why is it so terrible? There are good reasons for Quebec to remain in Canada. There are also good reasons for greater autonomy for Quebec. That the Star recognizes this is well and good, but its simplistic approach can be very dangerous. Jean-Paul Brousseau recently touched on English Canadian emotionalism: "When are English Canadians going to fathom that their 'respect' for obsolete and incompetent political institutions plays into our collective death, and that a revolution is after all nothing but the healthy capacity to get rid of those elements of life which do not further life any more?"

An editorial

Sleepwalking to disaster

★ Canada's future is imperilled by the election of a Quebec government dedicated to separation. The Star believes sweeping changes are urgently needed if Canada is to be saved. This is the first of five editorials which will discuss the problem and suggest a solution.

McGrath has yet to take effective action

Dear Editor:

We, the residents of the second floor of the Graduate Residence, feel that we have a problem which would be of interest to the student body as a whole with regards to the residence accommodation and administration.

Our problems started when we moved in. There is a lot of construction going on immediately below our floor which has involved the use of pneumatic drills since the beginning of September. This construction was to have been completed prior to our tenancy. The initial thrills of having a vibrating bed have worn off for most of us and being awakened by the sweet soothing tones of a pneumatic drill is a pleasure which must be experienced to be appreciated.

As if this was not enough, the construction has caused the heat to be consistently inadequate and to actually go off several times. Conveniently, the days without heat have corresponded to the coldest days so far.

We have complained several times to Professor Gerald McGrath, the Director of Residences, and have been assured that the problems will be rectified. However, as yet no effective action has been taken. With exams approaching this problem is becoming critical. The University as a landlord is in violation of Kingston Property Standards and Anti-Noise By-laws as well as in violation of The Landlord and Tenant Act. If our landlord was not the University we could, and probably would have had, our problems fixed quickly without much fuss. As it is we are being labelled as "discipline problems" for the University merely because we wish a decent place to live.

Hopefully making this problem public will result in an increased sensitivity on the part of the University to student problems with respect to accommodation. Others should be able to profit from our misfortunes.

Grads: end the freeze!

by Colin d'Eca

It is alarming to see the persistent myopic policy of retarding Graduate education and research via economic constraint reiterated in the Policy statement of the Minister for Universities and Colleges in Ontario issued last year, to continue the three year 'freeze' of Graduate funding for a further five years. This decision is reflected in the Senate Budget review Committee's recommendation not to increase the proportional component for Graduate financing in the Queen's budget.

It is essential that a strong and vigorous graduate-research program be maintained in the Universities, in order that the 'raison d'être' of the Universities as centres of academic excellence and intellectual freedom be maintained. It is only through a vigorous intellectual activity within itself, that the university can be an effective educational institution, importing values and critiques essential for a healthy and free society.

It is through the development of vociferous and critical minds that basic political and social freedoms and benefits will be achieved and preserved, and through pure basic research that the economic prosperity required to ensure those political and social demands can be achieved.

It is obvious in the present situation of economic depletion, that resources must be utilized efficiently and thus in terms of graduate education requires a coherent national policy on the nature and level of research carved out by the Universities, in relation to their role as an academic institution and their responsibilities to society at large.

stronger lobbying needed

It is thus with some optimism that I greet the proposals emanating from the recent AUCC conference at Regina Nov. 1-4 (Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada). The call by the outgoing President, M. Oliver for increased political activity by AUCC, in order to become a more effective lobby, especially with respect to the negotiations concerning the Fiscal Arrangements Act due to expire March 1977 is prerequisite for establishing a coherent university policy in Canada. The universities must formulate clearer objectives for the University community and then press for recognition of these needs from both the Federal and Provincial Governments.

The AUCC must cooperate more with other interested parties in gaining adequate research funding. This requires that a National Research plan be recognized and centres of excellence in various disciplines be recognized, so that efficient distribution of limited resources occurs, and unnecessary duplications of work are eliminated. This latter point impinges upon the need for a critical evaluation of the performance of the Universities with emphasis on quality of education rather than the quantity of output

There must be a recognition of the need to maintain high standards and admissions to Graduate programmes. Those graduates admitted should be ensured of sufficient financial support for the duration of the study programme, which will of necessity have to be fixed by a maximum four years for a PhD. Restrictions on the total amounts earned in paid work should be moved and only those restrictions on maximum hours worked (at present 10 hours per week) should be retained. It is essential to recognize that the investment of time and the loss of potential earnings by a graduate student be partially compensated for in the funding arrangements.

As for the nature of funding, there is an increasing amount of contract research being carried out in Universities, and if this were to be taken to the extreme the Universities would become more operational basis for migrant contractors and consultants, the professional ethic would be undermined and ultimately the interests of students and the country at large would suffer. Contractual research must never be seen as a remedy for inadequate traditional grant support for research.

Another insidious example of the weakening of the university is the increasing tendency for Granting Councils to fail to give total financial support for a research programme. This will lead to the undermining of the Peer review system, and grants will not be awarded strictly on the basis of merit, but whether or not the University could contribute towards the direct costs of the Grant.

With regard to these requirements the Ministry of State for Science and Technology and the Council of Ministers of Education have set up the Canadian Committee on financing University Research—which will make recommendations on policies, programmes and procedures affecting financing of research in Universities.

Also, the Science Council recognizing the decline of graduates and research workers in the 1970's has expressed concern at the agency of research manpower, leading to stagnation and a decline in advancement which could become critical in the 1990's; and has established a task force on Research in Canada to investigate this problem.

It is to be hoped that both these groups will not add to the empty rhetoric so prevalent amongst our politicians today, and will provide a strong formulation for a Canadian University Policy, on the strength of the Undergraduate programmes of the University are determined by the 'excellence' of the faculty, and this excellence is derived from the quality of 'research' and intellectual activity of this very same group, and those who will constitute that group—their graduate students

The business of medicine (law)

by Howard Smith

Not so long ago in B.C. this friend of mine who has a nose not unlike an elephant's trunk asked me if I knew anything about getting noses fixed, and whether such things were covered under the medical plan. When I told him he probably needed a Rhinoplasty, he remarked that an Elephantoplasty sounded more like it. Once having convinced him that a Rhinoplasty had nothing to do with rhinos or elephants, we did a little investigation. Being "cosmetic surgery", the medical plan did not cover the procedure. The B.C. College of Physicians & Surgeons recommended a physician's fee levy of $250.00 (total) for the whole "nose job". Further enquiries revealed that not a single plastic surgeon practicing in Vancouver did "the job" for less than $500. One in fact charged $1000.00 for surgery done in his own operating theatre, presumably to provide full uninterrupted access to surgery which could increase his number of "procedures" significantly. These charges were flat rates - that is any Rhinoplasty costs $500 - $1000 irrespective of its potential complexity.

This one example albeit an extreme one, serves to illustrate the "business" of Medicine. The same goes for the Legal Profession, which is also distinctly a business. These people sell their services to the public for reward, and a handsome one at that. It's time the public woke up to this fact and took the professional oath of dedication to philanthropy and justice with the skepticism it deserves.

One should recognize that if the Doctor or Lawyer has become the businessman, then the "patient" or "client" has become the "customer" with all its attendant responsibilities. A customer doesn't innately trust the vendor - as one might in the true professional relationship. Thus we must protect ourselves by doing what we ordinarily do when buying commodities or services. This means when you go to a physician or a lawyer your status as the "customer" gives you the right to ask, "why", "what for", "how much", and "why not some other way". Even where insurance schemes such as OHIP or Legal Aid are involved, you're still the customer, not to mention one of the only effective checks on insurance scheme abuses that are going to ultimately cost you personally.

The professional ethic, which is moribund if not completely dead, implied a certain degree of genuine interest in the welfare of those served. Perhaps this type of dedication continues to exist in spite of overt avarice, but it seems rather hard to believe. Granted it is possible that the true professional is not yet extinct, and that genuine dedication to the welfare of "patients" or "clients" beats in the breast of Dr. Kildare and Mr. Mason respectively. Nevertheless, so long as there are wolves in sheep's clothing lurking about, we'd be wise not to consider caveat emptor (let the buyer beware) as solely a maxim of the traditional market place.

The responsible sufferer

'A Saturday night at the O.F.S.

by Jim Klein

Lately I've been stricken (as can happen during essay season) by similarities between the tuition referenda question and what can occur on a particularly bad night in the pub line-up. These two issues somehow seem like symptoms of a greater problem in no way confined to our alma mater.

In drawing my analogy I must first set my scenario for my pub example. Picture a student, who, though he may have friends saving him a seat inside, (or a place in the lineup) humbly joining the back of the queue. Not a very fun place, it is true, but part of the myth of social responsibility is the belief that the insensitivity of some might destroy the cooperative spirit by which all flourish.

Within an hour or so an increasingly paranoid mind might start to correlate the meagre progress made so far with the number of 'reunions' occurring between himself and the entrance. One might speak out in frustration to a new arrival joining the line ahead of him. One might even win the point-yet generally the reply, if any, is a callous one.

At this point defending a valid self-interest any further would run counter to the same respect for enlightened cooperation that has placed (left?) the student where he is. After all, we do line up outside so that we might, once inside, go to the can or whatever without having to physically reclaim our seats upon returning.

And the referenda? Well surely the 22 percent who voted were attempting, at least, to make a responsible input to the democratic creation of an O.F.S. platform. Media coverage not only elicited their interest - it led them to believe that their votes mattered. Those voters followed the issue (and perhaps still do) in print, if only out of curiosity as to what the A.M.S. plans to do with the ballots from one week to the next.

Naturally, the voter hopes that his interest has not 'set him up' for the insult of being ignored. It is true that the referenda results are all but unintelligible unless the reasons for which people voted is known. But can we immediately conclude "too few votes from an unthinking conservative campus"? Tell that to someone who has cast every vote he had, as thoughtfully as was possible.

The student's recourse, should the referenda be ultimately ignored, would be a painful one. Having originally desired to responsibly help create a solid student stand, his devotion to making the O.F.S. politically practical might lead him to take an overt snub 'like a man'.

What then would have happened in each of the cases I have posited? In the pub line up, one person's recognition in action that each individual is responsible for everyone's access to a social benefit has hurt him personally. Perhaps a disgruntled voter will be asked to support a ticket that he dearly wished to help create, though his opinion has been suppressed on the grounds that his reasoning was never asked for.

The respective outcomes? Many people excuse themselves from pub lineups (if indeed there is anyone behind them). They may drink at home - an anti-social outcome born of the most sociable of intentions - without being sure whether they are disgusting or disgusted.

And if it came down to 'Saturday night at the O.F.S.'? Some might want to say "You and me, bud, out back" but it's you or me that returns. But then some might want to say that to a separatist Quebec too. Most probably the elector would spend his concern and energy on his textbooks, as the would-be pubber takes his money to the beer store.

And Queen's? A drunken, apathetic campus naturally

More on 'China Week'

Dear Editor:

I feel very upset after reading the article, "Perception of China Week" published in the Queen's Journal on Friday, November 26. The organizing committee of the China Week is posted as "a small group of interested members" who put forward the China Week without the approval of the Chinese Club executive committee. Worse still, the committee is blamed for "propagating" some political bias which might consequently lead to "the split up of the club and the destruction of harmony within the Queen's Chinese Community".

I am the member of the Organizing Committee. I would like to express some of my personal direct responses to this irresponsible article.

I indeed have great interest in helping the Chinese Club to organize the China Week. Firstly, I appreciate the effort and creativeness of the club in putting forward the China Week, the most worthwhile project in achieving one objective of the Club to promote the friendship between the Chinese and Canadians. Secondly, I, as a Chinese, think that it is my responsibility to know and study China and introduce her to the Canadian Community.

Since I am deeply involved in helping organize the China Week, I take the blame that China Week might lead to the "split up of the Chinese Club and the destruction of the harmony within the Queen's Chinese Community" very seriously. As far as the programmes are concerned, a lot of effort has been put into the involvement of more Chinese students. The motive behind it is to unite the Chinese instead of splitting up the Chinese community. The evidence can be shown explicitly when analyzing the programmes of the China Week.

The Cultural Night will be a variety show involving many students performing and taking charge of the back- and on-stage work. The Table-Tennis Tournament will be opened to all Chinese students interested in playing. All those who would like to investigate and explore knowledge about China are welcome to organize and arrange the Pictorial Exhibition and Slide Show. All these programmes together with the Guest Speaker Seminar are expected to draw as many attendants, both Chinese and Canadian. The China Week, hence, is a very significant project in getting more Chinese students to unite and involve.

The best way to avoid any splitting up is encouraging participation of the Chinese students, and making the China Week a success.

Clarification

China Week

Dear Editor:

I would like to clarify some of the points made by Simon Tam's letter dated 20th November, 1976 commenting on the "China Week"

First, the "China Week" programme had already been approved by the body of the Chinese Club Executive Committee on 14th October, 1976. However, the act of approval had been misinterpreted to be unbending by certain members of the Committee. Second, the organizing committee of the "China Week" is not physically independent since some of the Executives of the Club are involved.

The objectives of the "China Week" is to foster friendship and to better understanding between Chinese and Canadians aside from introducing Chinese culture to the community. Unfortunately, there have been some distortion of these objectives circulating. I would like to assure everybody concerned that the China Week Committee is trying their best to be as impartial in every aspect of the programme as possible. Their support and enthusiasm in this programme should be appreciated by us who are going to enjoy the accomplishment for which they have been working very hard. I would like to express our gratitude to them and to the patrons and sponsors from the Queen's community. More participation would be appreciated from the student population to help in preparing the programme.

Study space available

by Jane Toller
Adequate study space is apparently lacking on campus. This problem is magnified during the end of term when the academic workload is increased.

Statistical survey on the Library system was conducted in October 1975. It investigated the following areas of library use:

1. number of users in entire system
2. specific materials used (eg microfilm, periodicals, etc.)
3. amount of time spent in libraries
4. reasons for using the library

Concerning reasons for library usage, the results indicated that the number of students who stated that they study with library resources equalled the number of students studying with their own material.

If greater study space could be created through the allocation of presently existing areas on the university campus without additional lighting, heating and maintenance costs, the situation would be ideal. Perhaps those students who would not require library material, would then not occupy space within Douglas Library or its branches.

The Reading Room at Mackintosh-Corry Hall is an example of this. It is heavily used and the posted signs requesting no food or beverages are rarely heeded. The result is a heavier maintenance load for the caretaking staff and a less sanitary working atmosphere for its occupants.

It has been emphasized by the Senate Library Committee and the Senate Committee on Student Affairs to remind students of the university policy regarding available space for study purposes. During the day, a schedule of the room's availability might be posted on the door and in the evenings, the classrooms could remain open.

The university members must accept the responsibility of conscientious garbage disposal. This proposal of classroom allocation will be implemented on a trial basis within the next few weeks.

It is important that consideration for the caretakers is noticed. Due to the university's position of financial restraint, an increase of maintenance staff is not a plausible or economical solution.

For information purposes, there is below a partial list of the libraries and reading rooms on campus with their occupancy totals.

K. Keyes

Public service has become the main interest of my life. My profession, teaching is public service and my main non-professional activities are also public service.

I was born on Wolfe Island, and educated in Kingston schools. My father, John Keyes, was Reeve of Wolfe Island for many years, and also served as warden of the county of Frontenac. I thus grew up in an atmosphere of community service and politics.

I became a teacher at the age of 17. This meant that I got most of my professional education by attending university whilst I held a full-time job also. I took my Bachelor's Degree at Queen's University and my Master's Degree at the University of Ottawa. It was hard work but I enjoyed it, especially the Queen's University summer school sessions, which were a major part of my education.

Volunteer work with organizations

II: Establishing a municipal by-law restricting an employee of City Hall or department administrative position from remaining more than eight years and any other staff member from remaining more than six years. But this corrupted practise will be short lived and members forced to leave. By this by-law City Hall administration and service to the community is fresh and productive at the highest level for the community.

III: Establishing a municipal by-law providing each elected Mayor to have the option of selecting and hiring the secretary to the Mayor's office. Given this option no secretary may become a spy for a previous Mayor or corrupted control in City Hall from outside sources keeping the new Mayor in a surveillance position upon his business family or personal associates. It would also keep each elected Mayor out of a blackmailing position.

IV: That in the city of Kingston the Police Commission become larger than three ring circus of the Mayor, a district judge and the Police Chief. A by-law should be established allowing elected school board trustees of the Public and Separate School Board to be Police Commission members as well as elected representatives of the Federal Prisons of Kingston and area, a member of the Kingston Fire Department, a R.C.M. Police member from the Kingston Detachment and two separate news media members. One from the city, the other from outside the city of separate news companies.

The school board members are elected by the people to be in care of their children and teenage youth who are of the group that heavily gets involved in crime and onto the wrong roads in life making them major criminals later as well they are more subject to be victims so the elected school board members should be on the Police Commission.

I. Establishing a municipal by-law restricting any person to council office in Kingston or any municipality from holding a position as Mayor or Alderman for more than two elected terms or four years. This will prevent that which has happened in Kingston, where council members have remained for over a decade, making their council position a lifetime hobby and instituting measures in elections to prevent anyone from acquiring the same position in elections.

P. Guindon

When a city dies or a country, it is due to elected and appointed positions being dominated in dictator style, by the same people holding office for too many years and causing everything else around them to become just as rusty and dusty as an old worn out grandfather clock. Canada is dying, confederation and democracy are too, so are the people, when they should be living, healthy. We can if we want change to survive. Vote New. Vote different. Yes vote different. Vote out the seeming dictators and public office road hogs. Our city our country are murdered for a dollar or dime. Why? Because dictators who sing to taxpayers. Were the Kings of the castle and your dirty civies. This I've heard sung in City Hall, Police department and the military college.

Quebec, upside down province and destroying Confederation by its authority, being ruled by a group of public office long time sitters who allowed things to fall apart. In their stupid-dictator style they destroyed the native tribes, people lost their rights and land, and language, and the french immigrants under dictatorship forget the tribes' rights as human beings. The French complain about not being able to run their own affairs or worry of their language rights. Tried forcing us to speak the french. We of the Limestone City, Kingston, should learn a good lesson and watch that we do not lose like the native tribes. Beware and be careful of the insane who experiment even by use of drug gas and cancerous dust sprayed by airplanes.

Fort Henry is the major attraction in the district. Records show that tourists enjoy Fort Henry but do not stay long in the area. By supplying

Edward Phipps-Walker

I am pleased to have this opportunity to address myself to the students and readers of the Queen's Journal. My association with this university started in the 1940's and it has always been a rewarding and happy af-other attractions, we could encourage longer stays. The development of the olympic site, and the organization of a summer festival, could both be developed for this purpose.

We are blessed with a magnificent water front, and we are beginning to appreciate it. The preservation of public access to that water front is vital; the maintenance and development of city-owned water front is equally so. Public and private ownership at the water front can be developed harmoniously together to get the best of both. The economic development of private lands linked with the water front requires a major effort on our part.

The water front should be a lively and active area, bringing vitality to the downtown. The revitalization of downtown Kingston is proceeding in heartening fashion. I certainly want to continue this and I am pledged to support it. Moreover, I am pleased to see many of the aldermanic candidates expressing the same desire.

Queen's University itself is another of our great assets. Queen's is known as an institution of national stature and prestige. Co-operation between the city and the University is essential, and I am proud to have been a member of the Queen's-City Liaison Committee which has done much to foster that co-operation.

For the past few years we have had great fun hosting visitors for the Olympics and celebrating our tercentenary. Now is the time to look at our own city as a place to live. We need to improve our municipal services, we need better sidewalks in many areas, we need storm sewers in some areas, we need to carry out the aims of the neighbourhood improvement program in St. Lawrence ward. I believe I have the knowledge and experience to lead the city towards the objectives and I am seeking the opportunity to do so.

One of my deepest regrets is that I did not take the advice of the then Principal, Dr. Wallace, to leave my position as Engineer officer and its carefree existence as a freebooting sailor to toil away at, what seemed to me at the time to be, a very long and exacting discipline.

I attended boarding school in England when I was five and a half years old (Winchester House) then passed on to Highgate public school. I worked in French North Africa in mining and I left for a holiday in the U.S. Three days after I arrived war was declared and I joined the Canadian Navy at Esquimalt. I then attended Royal Roads, becoming the first officer to be promoted from the ranks. I served in the North Atlantic Squadron and the Home Fleet aboard a British Battleship. I acquired my engineering certificate for 43,000 hp steam and when I returned to Canada I was senior engineer officer of a flotilla of minesweepers, five in number. After the war was finished I became the staff engineer officer of this district.

I am hoping that all of you will exercise your right on Monday and I want to tell you the highlights of my campaign to become Mayor.

1. Since I became Harbourmaster twenty-five years ago I have actively worked to develop trade in the harbour from foreign countries, as well as Canada. - 22,000 vessels in all.

2. I am a free agent with no political commitments and my office on the Kingston Harbour would be open for assistance. I would advocate strongly that the City Council meetings be held in the open.

3. I would deal directly with the Ontario Government to maintain or improve the funding for Queen's and to keep the fees at a reasonable level.

4. I would investigate the exorbitant rents that are charged to the students and I would take action to force the owners to keep their property well maintained.

5. The environment situation is a serious problem that is going to have to be dealt with and I would be guided by the ideas from people like you.

6. I would work closely with industry to help with student summer employment.

7. I would dispense with our present garbage disposal which is costing the city over $500,000 a year and would recycle the waste to provide fertilizer and heat, thus conserving the dwindling supply of fuels, to implement the program of Prof. Brown & Clarke.

8. Protection of historical buildings, such as the Steam museum, Marine museum, Simcoe House, etc. 11 houses which were obtained from me by the Heritage Foundation.

I am impressed by the cultural lift which the University gives Kingston and the students' sense of humour serves as a constant reminder that they are indeed a very integral part of our community. The citizens of Wolfe Island I am sure will still remember the time that some high spirited students changed the timetables on the Wolfe Island dock and the Kingston dock, thereby reversing the entire operation for hundreds of people and cars. The initiation proceedings are eagerly watched by Kingstonsians following a dull and apathetic summer, and the parades with the pipers and the floats add considerably to Kingston's dimensions. We want you to be happy here acquiring your education. It is the most important part of your life and I would dedicate myself to maintain a good healthy climate for learning.

Please exercise your rights on Monday, Dec. 6 I respectfully solicit your vote.

K. Spence

Kit is primarily concerned with four issues in Kingston.

HOUSING:

Under present by-laws many landlords are exempt from certain housing standards because their properties are not considered "Boarding Houses." As a result, the city has no authority to issue work orders governing such matters as fire escapes. Kit feels that the city should amend these by-laws so that all leaseholds in the city receive equal protection.

CRIME:

Juvenile crime is rising at a rapid rate, especially in the downtown areas. There are fewer parks, there are fewer recreational facilities and there are more bootleggers for the children of the downtown to come in contact with. The city, in the past has favoured the suburbs when it has come to allocating these resources. Kit believes that this must end and that the bootleggers operating in the downtown have to be busted if juvenile crime is to be reduced.

EMPLOYMENT:

Another factor favouring crime is the high unemployment rate of people living in the downtown area. Kingston does not have much room within the city to expand its industrial facilities but efforts must be made to provide persons seeking work with the opportunity of going to work. Bringing in industries that will employ white-collar professionals will not lower the unemployment rate of the unskilled labourer.

EQUALITY:

Practically all of the municipal services are administered in a better fashion to those citizens living in the suburbs. Garbage collections and street maintenance are only two examples. There is only one municipally funded Day Care centre in Kingston and it is in the suburbs and unfilled. Privately operated Day Care facilities in the downtown have less adequate equipment and have long waiting lists. The children of immigrants who live in the downtown have no accessible school where they can learn English as a second language. The only fully equipped school for this is Queen Elizabeth and it is in the suburbs.

Kit believes that many of these problems have been allowed to develop through neglect and because Kingston is obsessed with a rich-poor, north south, young-old cleavage with the result that the poor and the underprivileged are not as well treated as those who have more power and influence.

Kit also believes that we shall not attract more tourists or industries to a city such as Kingston as long as we let the above problems and conflicts go unresolved. Further, we can not resolve the above problems until we welcome all residents regardless of stature, back into the political process in Kingston.

Candidates for Alderman, Sydenham ward

T. French

TERRY FRENCH has represented Sydenham Ward since October 1975, when Council appointed him to replace Keith Norton when he resigned to take up office as M.L.A. for the Province.

He has served in the Community Service Committee as Vice-Chairman of the Works Committee and a member of the Transportation Committee.

He was elected to the Kingston Board of Education in 1964, and served continuously for 10 years during which time the Board

W. Knapp
BACKGROUND

Bill Knapp is running for alderman in Sydenham Ward. Bill is employed at the Research Centre for DuPont of Canada. He is married (with three children) and lives with his family in their renovated older home at 229 Barrie St.

Bill is an active member of the Agnes Etherington Gallery Association at Queen's University. He is on the Board of Stewards for Chalmers and in that capacity also serves as Chairman of the Property Committee. Bill is one of the directors for the Sydenham Ward Tenants and Ratepayers Association.

CONCERNS

In order to establish what the student concerns were Bill and his helpers have canvassed as many amalgamated into the Frontenac County Board of Education. He was Chairman of the Board for 4 of the years that he served. "As an Alderman for Sydenham Ward I will continue to serve the people of the Ward and do my utmost to present their problems to City Council in a manner that will not only be a benefit to Sydenham Ward in particular but, also the general public of the City as a whole."

I am concerned with the traffic problems in Sydenham Ward and as a member of the Transportation Committee, I am deeply concerned with the Parking and Street Lighting within the Ward," the Alderman stated.

Over the past 23 years, he has held numerous offices in many public organizations in the City. He is a member of the Board of Trustees of Queen's University.

He is also a member of the Building Committee at Queen's University, the Campus Planning Committee, Queen's University, and is Vice-Chairman, Executive Committee Queen's University.

He is President and Manager of Radio Station CKLC AM and FM.

L. Miller

A few days ago, a reporter for radio station CKLC telephoned and in the course of an interview asked me unexpectedly - on the air - why I was seeking re-election as alderman in Sydenham Ward. I answered quickly, "Because I've enjoyed being alderman". That sometimes surprises me (for example, I'm not sure I would have answered so readily if he had asked me last week after a five-hour Planning Board meeting). Despite the serious commitments of time and energy, and the frustrations of the job, I have enjoyed being one of Sydenham Ward's representatives on City Council.

Students reading The Journal may feel, however, that issues like tourist promotion, downtown revitalization and historic conservation have little relevance to their lives. Yet in the past two years, students have been among the most articulate and concerned of my constituents. They have asked questions (e.g., regarding public transit, street lighting, taxis) and made suggestions. They have asked for help in insisting on needed improvements to the houses or apartments they rent. They have asked for advice on rent control and other landlord-tenant problems.

Students, especially those living off campus, will find that as they become involved with the Kingston community, their responsibility to the community will grow as well. If a group of four or five students are renting a house, they will find that they, like their non-student neighbours, are responsible for general maintenance of the property. They will be asked to put out their garbage at the appropriate times, cut the grass, keep cars off the lawn, move the stereo speakers off the front steps. They will be part of the community, which has obligations to provide them with certain services and facilities just as they have obligations to it in return.

Students have the right to voice their opinions on any issues facing the community, and their voice is of value.

J. Clements

My name is John Clements and I am a candidate for alderman in Ontario Ward.

As a graduate of Queen's (B.A. Hons 1971 - Geography; B.Ed. 1972) I am concerned about the relationship between the University and the city and between the students and other groups in Kingston. It is my belief that the relations between the University and the city have matured in the last several years. This has been done through the Queen's City Liaison Committee. Continued communication that occurs in this committee that occurs is necessary if the city and Queen's are to break down the very 'real' prejudices and biases, city citizens generally have of the university, and vice versa.

The other area of concern is housing - not just student housing but housing stock of all types.

Over 1200 students live in Ontario Ward in the area of Barrie, Princess, Frontenac and Johnson St. Students here, like all other groups such as senior citizens, the physically young couples and singles, are forced to pay increasingly exorbitant rents. This is primarily due to supply is less than demand, but restrictive zoning west of Alfred St. will compound this problem in the future.

I believe the city must involve itself in the area of housing. A recent study suggested that zoning regulations could be changed to increase the number of bachelors and three bedrooms. This type of housing is in short supply.

I believe also that the city should enter the housing market more actively by setting up a non-profit housing corporation. This is one way to be sure of increasing supply. If there are any questions, please do not hesitate to contact me at 544-3827.

Ontario Ward I would like to see increased police surveillance as a deterrent to vandalism and break-ins

P. Fountas

Being an alderman candidate for Ontario Ward has been an invaluable experience for me. The campaign has opened my eyes to a lot of problems in Kingston.

The issue of planning is important to me especially in light of recent developments in the downtown area. I feel that this issue of planning deserves the full support of all citizens. I also believe that more concern should be expressed in the area of new planning.

In order to fully understand the wishes and ideas of my constituents I would be inclined toward having regular ward meetings. This is part of my basic philosophy that the aldermen are the representatives of the people and therefore should represent their wishes and demands.

One group in the community that deserve special attention are our senior citizens. I would endeavor to give this community building sector of our city a taxbreak.

The city must also be more concerned with the plight of the unemployed. To this end I propose a universal tax reduction.

Through promotion of the city's natural beauty and history we can encourage tourism and indirectly employment of the local citizenry. Towards the end of making Kingston a better place to live we must be mindful of accessibility to our waterfront.

I wish to thank the Journal for the opportunity to present my views. I encourage all students to vote on Dec. 6.

In homes and apartments. Requesting your support on Monday, December 6th, 1976.

With over 10,000 students and a staff numbering 3,500, Queen's University is a major part of the Kingston community, an importance which is magnified by its location close to the heart of the City. Having been active within the University as a graduate, a teacher of local government courses, President of the Faculty Association, and campus planner, one becomes very aware of the interaction between town and gown. At the same time Kingston is my home and over the years I have been drawn into City affairs as a civic official, consultant and member of the Planning Board. Knowing one can only be one voice among fifteen on City Council, it is rash to make promises. However, one can indicate why one is motivated to run for office, the attitudes one has, and those matters which are of concern, so that voters can make their own judgements. To say that one is in favour of planning and improving the quality of life has become commonplace. More particularly I have taken an active role in the preservation of Kingston's architectural heritage, strengthening of the downtown as the heart of the community, improving access to the waterfront and the Little Cataraqui River, and promoting the neighbourhood improvement program in the area to the north of Princess Street. Housing, especially in the older area of the City and for those handicapped in meeting their needs through the private market, is a continuing problem. Here the interest of the City and that of the University conflict in some respects as the University displaces families and those with low incomes, while the changing needs of students are inadequately met. Having a foot in both camps and some very relevant experience, I would hope to help alleviate, if not solve, this common problem.

D.M. Robinson

One of the favourite questions of any campaign is "why are you running for office". It's a fair question and deserves a fair answer. Mine is that I have had a longing to serve the area in an elected position for as long as I can recall.

I remember as a youth watching election results, attending rallies and going door to door for candidates. I believed in it. It was exciting and of course worthwhile if your candidate won.

J.P. Gerretsen

Queen's University has always played an important role in the history of the City of Kingston. Without the University and the Royal Military College, Kingston would simply be another small Ontario town. The University, its staff and students, give the community a unique and special character. Kingston derives tremendous economic benefits from having the University located here in terms of employment as well as obvious educational, cultural and social benefits.

At the same time, however, a large segment of the student population feels isolated from the normal day to day activities of our City and does not get involved in the long range issues which arise in the City. Much has been accomplished especially in the last four years by the City-Queen's Liaison Committee in dealing with any problems which have arisen from time to time particularly problems which are of a concern to students. A prime example is the new Property Standards By-law by which City Council has shown its concern over the question of inadequate housing including student accommodation in private homes. This by-law intends to guarantee for each one of our citizens a decent and comfortable place to live. The enforcement of this by-law eventually will eliminate all substandard housing units in the City.

There are many other issues which should be of interest to students as well as other citizens of our community. For example, I am totally in favour of a revitalization of the downtown area which would include the construction and renovation of housing units in our City's inner core so that the downtown area will be an alive place at night as well as during the day. I also advocate increased public ownership of our waterfront and in particular the Little Cataraqui Creek area in order that access to the waterfront and nature areas be retained and preserved for future generations.

As a former Queen's student and graduate - Arts '64 and Law '67 - I feel that I am aware of the student problems and look forward to hearing from you and, with your support, at any time during the next two years at 544-3853.

K. Raven

Ken Raven, Candidate for Alderman in Victoria Ward is a 1971 Queen's B.A. Grad. He started Queen's in 1946 after service in the R.C.A.F. - but had to leave with one year remaining for a degree. He returned in 1969 taking 4 subjects while running his business and trying to carry on a family life. Taking 2 more courses the next year enabled him to graduate one year ahead of his eldest son. Two other children are presently enrolled at Queen's, Diane, 4th year Phys Ed and Doug, 2nd year Arts and Sciences.

Ken Raven has lived in Victoria Ward for over 20 years and has run a business in Kingston for 28 years. His business experience gives him a City Wide outlook. "At this time of spiralling costs, business people are needed to help keep a sensible balance between growth and costs. The City has to keep up its essential services but avoid extravagance," he said.

Mr. Raven has served many local organizations in executive capacities. These include the Chamber of Commerce, Kingston Kiwanis Club, Kingston Industrial Commission, Kingston Off Street Parking Association and was Chairman of the United Way Campaign in 1973.

Ken Raven is vitally interested in all segments of Kingston, is well aware of Queen's importance to our community and is at present a volunteer member of Queen's Apartment Residence Board.

He solicits your vote on Monday, December 6th to elect him Alderman for Victoria Ward.

When I left school, I got a job as a newspaper reporter with a daily and thought I had really arrived in life. Imagine, no bills and making $52.50 a week from Lord Thompson of Fleet.

My first assignment was to cover city hall in Port Colborne Ontario. From that day on, I have been interested in running for an office in municipal government. It's the one level of government where you feel the people's needs, you know your electorate and they know you.

I worked in 1971 as the special assistant to the Provincial Opposition Leader at Queen's Park, Toronto. Bob Nixon was a great teacher. I found my feelings about seeking office myself one day had not been dampened even after Bob's defeat as Premier for Ontario. You must be prepared to be defeated as well as win when you let your name stand.

My reason for wanting the Queen's University vote is simple, I can't win without it. The West campus holds the balance for all candidates in Victoria Ward.

Presently I am employed as President, D.M. Robinson Alarms; Sales Mgr. Maclean-Hunter Communications, Counsellor, Joyceville Institution, Host, "All The Jazz", CKLC FM.

Y. Tarnowecy

I have been interested and involved in community activities all my life and am concerned with Kingston's future. My immediate concern is the apparent apathy of the citizens of this city, including the students, with respect to the municipal elections. I am of the opinion that since this is the 'grass roots' level of government and affects the residents' day-to-day activities, it should be accorded a higher priority. Students must realize that such things as higher property taxes affect them indirectly in the form of higher rents.

I sense that one of the reasons for this apathy is the feeling among the electorate that an individual's views, to a large extent, are only solicited during an election campaign. Realizing that participatory democracy when carried to an extreme would most likely result in anarchy, I am of the opinion that an elected representative should canvass the views of his constituents before voting on a major issue in Council.

If as I contact the ward constituents and listen to their views, if elected, I will attempt to reflect the individuals' concerns in Council.

As a Queen's graduate, I wish to thank the Journal for devoting a special section to the municipal election and thereby directing the students attention to the freedom that is largely neglected in our society — the right to vote.

Candidates for Kingston School Board

J. Bannister

John Bannister, B. Comm. (Queen's) '47, is Secretary of the University and Secretary of the Board of Trustees. He has served as President of the Junior Chamber of Commerce and was an alderman for Sydenham ward for four years. He is a member of the Kingston Historical Society, the Frontenac Historical Foundation and the Board of Trustees of Queen's Theological College.

Mr. Bannister said, "I consider it essential in these times of high inflation to make certain that full value is obtained for every tax education dollar. It must be recognized, however, that quality education does not come at a discount. My experience in administration at Queen's, my concern as a property owner, tax payer, and as a parent, and my lack of any conflicting interests, should be of value in making decisions which are in the best interest of our school children and those who must pay the cost of their education."

Mr. Bannister resides at 12 Strathcona Crescent. He is married and has three children all of whom attended Lord Strathcona School, Calvin Park School and Loyalist Collegiate and Vocational Institute. His daughter, Patty (Mrs. Brian Cox), graduated in nursing science at Queen's in 1975.

J. Campey

Why would a Queen's student want to be a Trustee on the Frontenac County Board of Education? My name is John Campey, I'm a second year Politics and History student at Queen's, and a candidate for trustee. A lot of people have been asking me that question over the past few weeks, and the answer isn't easily put into a few words.

As a High School student, I became very interested and involved with the York County Board of Education. As a Student Council President and Chairman of the County Students Association, I became aware of some of the problems created by a lack of student representation on Boards of Education, and became convinced that the only way to fill this gap was by getting students elected to the Board. For this reason, I managed the campaign of a friend of mine, a student, who contested a Board of Education by-election in Stouffville, my home town.

As a University student, I became aware of some of the shortcomings of Ontario's Public and Secondary School system. There is no reason why one in three students entering Queen's University should need to take part in remedial English courses, as was recommended in "The Queen's English." The Public and Secondary School systems are not doing their job. This concerns me — concerns me sufficiently that I am doing something about it. Please show your concern by finding out what you can about your Board of Education candidates, and then vote on December 6. I would appreciate your support.

My belief in connection with education is that the pursuit of excellence must be a primary aim of our schools — this must motivate every aspect of activity in school. Our need is not merely for more education but for education of a higher quality. Secondly, I want to see French language study begun in the earliest grades, and this can be a viable programme using video tape methods — even without fully bilingual teachers being available in the numbers needed. Thirdly, we need stronger athletic and physical fitness programmes which must emphasize participation by all students.

Much of a student's learning is done outside school hours and outside school walls. I want to develop this and make even greater use of the learning resources that we have here in the city. We also have a large pool of human talent in Kingston, many of whom would be prepared to make their time available to help enrich school courses.

Costs continue to mount and today more than 30 percent of the tax revenue of Ontario goes to finance education at all levels. It is imperative that we get full value for every dollar we spend. To this end our first priority must be to have excellent teachers, and in sufficient numbers, to ensure good teacher-student ratios in the classroom.

In the face of much turmoil and change, we must help our children to achieve that balance between cooperation and competition, and between intellectual and athletic pursuits that they need to face their future with confidence.

Trustee W.B. (Buster) Doubleday has announced that he will seek re-election to the Frontenac County Board of Education for an eighth term.

"We as board members, must look seriously at priorities and the real need of our schools", he said. He said costs have gone up continuously since the inception of the county board system (in 1969) because all county schools had to be upgraded to provide equal educational opportunities.

"Schools have to be maintained and must be covered with insurance, which has become very costly," he said. "There must be transportation provided, school supplies provided, heat and electricity supplied. Building of new schools... has to be included in the budget each year."

Mr. Doubleday is a past chairman of the Kingston Board of Education and has served on most board committees during his 14 years as a trustee.

He is the board's representative to the Ontario Public School Trustees' Association and is a past president of the association. He is a director at present. He also served for three years on the curriculum committee of Ontario Trustees' Council.

"He is concerned about children that have learning problems. For over 15 years he has been involved with the Mentally Retarded and children with perceptual handicaps. It is his hope that more can be done for them and many students who are now in regular classes who need special attention."

Rather than considering the closing of schools, and that since there is a continual decline in school enrollment, it is his hope that some of these empty classrooms will be utilized for special classes.

Mr. Doubleday lives at 26 Algonquin Terrace, Kingston, and has been a resident for almost 25 years. He has a son and daughter who are graduates of the Kingston school system. He said he is pleased with the system. His son and daughter are also graduates of Queen's University of which he is very proud.

M. Lavery

Padre Lavery, Chairman of the Frontenac County Board of Education and Dean of the Board in terms of service, is seeking re-election.

The Padre's experience on the Board dates back to 1951. He is the past Chairman of the City and County Board, past Chairman of Committees of these Boards, past President of the Ontario Urban and Rural School Trustees Association and a former member of the Ontario School Trustees Council. He won in 1973 the Lamp of Learning Award of the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation, which is "presented each spring to a non-teaching resident of Ontario who has made an outstanding contribution to secondary education in the Province."

He was recently quoted as saying "I believe every citizen has a public duty, and since education at all three levels has been my field of work for more than 25 years, I feel I can best serve my fellow citizens and their sons and daughters as a trustee."

"I feel that I know the problems, some solutions and some things that won't work."

Won Royal Canadian Navy Cadetship in competitive examinations prior to completing Junior Matriculation at KCVI in 1940. Served 27 years in the Navy, including 5 in wartime at sea.

1950's twice in command of operational warships. Disgusted at inability of subordinate officers to draft reports for my signature, although 3 or 4 were ex-UNTD's. Began Queen's Extramural courses in 1958 (to replace Earle Stanley Gardner.)

1964 - a benevolent superior arranged appointment to Kingston with semi-official authorization to "use 1000 taxpayer hours towards your degree". Completed Queen's BA 1966 (mostly 'moonlighted').

1967-1975 - specialist Secondary School teacher of geography mostly in Frontenac County. Certified "disabled" after 3 mini-strokes. Educational beliefs:

1) Frontenac County graduates should be among the first to regain graduate capability in reading, writing, and understanding our own language. A pertinent 4-year programme should be instituted. Ministry of Education should be urged to restore provincial examinations in English and applied arithmetic, after 3 years' warning. 2) Permissiveness in the schools must be reversed gradually. The word "No" must be encountered before adulthood. 3) Defaulted parental responsibilities for student guidance, discipline and motivation should be cultivated. 4) Let us kick Dr. Spock's preaching out of public education.

R. Miller

Many of the difficulties faced by the schools today are due to inadequate financing. The school trustees are in the dilemma of recognizing that the schools need more money to carry on adequate programs and knowing that the local tax-payers cannot be asked to pay more. If I were a trustee I would work towards having those best able to pay, contribute a great deal more towards educational costs than they do at the present time. Corporate business profits are increased by better educated employees: the Federal Government must see that corporate business pays their share.

There is a great need for more cooperation between the schools, parents and community. Parent and student involvement in decision making regarding curricula, extra-curricular activities and policy making is vital to synthesizing the formal educational process with the educational process that is going on outside school hours.

Above all, as trustee it would be my goal to provide an equal opportunity in education for all: the physically, mentally and culturally handicapped are entitled to an education that will enable them to contribute to society later on.

E. Naldrett

- resident of Sydenham Ward 26 years
- Arts '44 (Home Ec) University of Western Ontario
- Husband: S. N. Naldrett, Head of Chemistry and Chemical Engineering Department, Royal Military College.
- Son: Dana, Geology '79, Queen's University.

During the past two year term on the Board of Education, I have served in the following capacities:

Chairman (1976) - Education Committee.

-Task Force on Reporting Procedures

-Community Education Committee

Member-Committee to study community use of schools.

-Nutrition Committee (1975)

-Professional Activity Days Committee.

-Salary Negotiating Committee.

-Judging Team, Kingston and District Science Fair

The two most important areas in the school system are curriculum development and guidance. A curriculum core is an absolute necessity, but we must ensure that the necessary expansion of the minimum guidelines takes place in the classroom to fit students for post secondary studies. More and better counselling by community specialists, as a supplement to the guidance teacher's role, would better fit the needs of the secondary school student.

Your support will enable me to further my efforts in the struggle to concentrate the Board's resources in the classroom, where they belong. The best teachers, given the best tools, will do the job.

W. Thorburn

Wendy Thorburn, a 20 year resident of Kingston, is a parent of six children from five to 22 years of age. She is a U of T graduate (MA) and has a B.Ed. from Queen's. She has taught Sociology at Queen's and at Mount Allison University. She has also taught Nursery School, Public School and High School in Kingston.

Mrs. Thorburn opposes closing the downtown schools, as do many of the aldermanic candidates this year. She favours a stronger effort to improve literacy and mathematical skills in the public school system. She is also concerned about the quality of some of the teaching materials used in teaching History, and the resultant lack of understanding especially of Canadian History.

Mrs. Thorburn opposes teaching methods which depend on the pupil having well-educated parents and a good income. Schools should not penalize children whose parents cannot help them with essays, reading materials, grammar and mathematics lessons.

Since "illiteracy" has appeared as a province-wide issue in this election for school boards, core curricula and compulsory subjects will undoubtedly receive immediate priority from trustees throughout Ontario.

No improvement is achieved by faulting the Ministry for its past contributions to our students' deficiencies. New standardized curriculum guides, along with standardized examinations, will soon be imposed to cover all grades 9 and 10. The first step to provincial recovery has been taken.

However, during the next three years, it is incumbent upon every school board to focus sharply upon present senior grades, to discover the weaknesses and to provide remedies.

Incidentally, this "illiteracy" is not unique to today's students.

P. Watson

Bringing about education improvement in our schools is not going to be easy. It will require competent and cooperative trustees working together with Ministry of Education officials, administrators, teachers and parents. The dream of a constantly improving school system is possible and must be pursued.

As your trustee, seeking a third two year term, I have visited most of the schools in this county. Quality education in Frontenac schools has been my major concern - whether city, Kingston township or northern county schools. Our education committee, established two years ago, concerns itself with questions related to school curricula. The "Three R's" do receive a lot of attention in the Frontenac County school system and the education committee is continually asking questions and seeking ways to assist in the improvement of instruction in all subject areas. I have strongly supported the hiring of first rate teachers and I support professional activity days designed to improve instructional procedures and to increase communication between parents and teachers, particularly in the area of pupil evaluation.

As professor of education in the history-social science curriculum area I spend considerable time working with local history teachers, both at the elementary and the high school level, showing teachers ways to make the study of Canada a much more interesting, challenging and meaningful experience for pupils in their classes.

The Immigration Question — by Brian Green

by Brian Green

Charges of mismanagement and malfeasance, rampant disillusion with the AIB, and the stunning victory of the PQ in Quebec are just some of the more prominent issues that have already brought the ship-of-state perilously close to being swamped in a deluge of criticism and controversy. The bold enunciation of sweeping revisions to immigration policy promises to mire the federal Liberals even more deeply in that tenacious quagmire of political polemics. Outside of bilingualism, immigration is probably the touchiest issue going: so it seems safe to predict another intensely heated round in that ever-revolving, ever-unresolved debate on Canadian immigration.

The intention of the revisions is to allow more participation by the provinces, primarily because the architects of the new policy want to dovetail priorities more closely with regional unemployment and regional concerns. Quotas - although department officials prefer a less blunt word - have been proposed. Above all, there is the implicit realization that the immigration policies of today will irrevocably alter the national character - both economic and demographic - of the Canada of tomorrow.

The issues raised are certainly emotional enough. There are the omni-present charges of discrimination: of prejudice in the subjective decisions of immigration officers, of favouritism in the administration if not the conception of our supposedly enlightened "point-system" of evaluation. There is concern that immigrants deprive native-born Canadians of jobs in a highly competitive labour market. And when people perceive - whether justifiably or not - the livelihood of their families threatened by Blacks, Chinese, and Pakistanis, the ugly spectre of racism can't be far off.

But the problems and issues are more diverse than this, and their ramifications and permutations can be highly complex. And that makes a temperate, rational debate all the more unlikely. It is with this difficulty in mind that I'd like to submit a few pertinent questions. I hope that this series of questions may delineate a few of the conflicting viewpoints that arise, and help to set in perspective some of those common anxieties and familiar misconceptions that beset the immigration debate.

Do immigrants actually create more jobs by stimulating the economy, by demanding more goods and services than those of us already comfortably settled here? Are they more productive, more success oriented, more courageous entrepreneurs, more assiduous savers than native-born Canadians, or are they by and large malingering, suspicious, and socially parasitic?

It seems that Canadians by birth prefer government hand-outs in far greater proportions - what does that say about the pride and independence of new Canadians? Or do foreigners just flock here to benefit from our generous social services, to greedily extort government pensions they haven't really paid for? When business leaders complain that Canadians are unreliable, unproductive, and unsatisfied with low wages in menial jobs, where else are the workers going to come from to sustain our accustomed standard of living? Is this exploitation? Does it take jobs away from Canadians? Wouldn't Canadian industry be vastly more competitive with a bigger market, with the economies of scale in transportation and production that more immigration would entail? Is there a moral obligation to an overpopulated world to share our conspicuous wealth and vast territory? Do we in fact really have room for any more people in this overwhelmingly frigid and inhospitable land? Can even doubling our population in the coming decades really solve the problems of a world where the scale is in billions, not millions? What sort of dislocations is that kind of population going to create in our economy, in the regional imbalances of people and prosperity? Are we immoral in accepting only the highly skilled and affluent, those who are most desperately needed in the under-developed nations they leave behind? Is it ethical to dictate where immigrants may settle? Do Blacks and Italians and Portuguese make our cities more cosmopolitan, more hospitable and more habitable? Or do they increase crime, swell welfare rolls, overcrowd our schools, and drive up the price of real estate? Is Quebec's concern about her French identity being inundated by the sheer numbers of English-speaking immigrants justified? Whose patriotism and loyalty is more questionable, someone who consciously chose this country and this way of life, who probably overcame tremendous odds to earn his citizenship, or someone who by an accident of fate was fortunate enough to be born here? What about our own "Canadian-ness": weren't our own ancestors immigrants at one time, too? Do we owe some sort of historical debt of equal opportunity? Are Canadians at heart afraid of anything different of new languages, foreign customs, dark skins? Is our own culture enriched or insulted? Can we reasonably expect them to assimilate, or should we encourage the strengthening of their own cultural identity? Are we in fact-as tolerant, as free of prejudice, as liberal as we always smugly supposed?

Any constructive debate on immigration policy will, hopefully, address itself to all of these questions. And there are many more. I imagine that it will be a pretty revelatory and uncomfortable exercise for most of us.

Where do I stand? My own inclination is to admire someone who has the spirit and the confidence to completely uproot himself and his family, to abandon the familiarity of traditions and language, the security of relatives and friends, to risk almost a process of natural selection we end up with the most ambitious, the toughest, the survivors, people who are usually superior in those essential, intangible qualities that make for success.

Personally, I think that new Canadians have contributed a tremendous amount to this country. They're diligent, conscientious workers who rarely end up on the dole, whose prudently banked savings eventually end up as investments - producing more jobs for all of us. They help diminish the insularity and choking parochialism of our cities just look at the changes large-scale immigration has wrought in Toronto over the past ten years.

But it is absurd to argue on the premise that by accepting unlimited numbers of immigrants we can really solve the world's over-population problems. Indeed, doesn't the fact that the sort of efficient agriculture we enjoy-capital, not labour, intensive-actually contribute more to alleviating starvation by producing quantities vastly surplus to our own needs? And I wonder how many more millions this country is really able to hold? Is our economy infinitely expansive? How much further north can we push forward the frontiers of agriculture?

There is no doubt that Canadians collectively harbour a great deal more prejudice than we are willing to admit. But while we may piously disparage that streak of intolerance, it would be foolishly idealistic to pretend that it just doesn't exist. How healthy, then, can it be to subject the fabric of Canadian society to the sort of strain-the "culture shock"-that a sudden influx of alien cultures and exotic peoples more liberal immigration would entail?

These sort of considerations suggest that we move cautiously. It looks as if the final solution will have to be a typically Canadian one of middle-of-the-road accommodation and compromise. But it is a decision, and a decision-making process, that I don't think we can reasonably defer much longer. At least in the sense that the debate which precedes any decision will be purgative-helping us to release our pent-up resentments and air those cancerous misconceptions-it can only be welcomed by us all.

China week ...

'Meaningful project'

Dear Editor:

The Queen's Chinese Club is going to present to the university and the Kingston community a CHINA WEEK at the end of January 1977. It will be quite a big event. Since somebody had tried to misinterpret it in Nov. '76's issue of the Journal, here I would like to provide the public a little more detail about the China Week although it is still two months away.

Historically individual Chinese Student Associations (CSA) in many Canadian universities held China Night or a series of programmes every year near the Chinese New Year. Feeling that in recent years there are rising interest about things happening in China and also in this land of multi-culturalism, mutual respect and understanding among different nationalities are vital, the CSA's of three universities, namely Toronto, McGill and Waterloo thought that it is necessary to have richer programmes to introduce Chinese Culture to the Canadian public as part of their contributions toward a harmonious multicultural Canada. They worked on a project called China Week and presented it in January 1976 to the general public in Montreal, Toronto, and Waterloo. Their efforts were well received and appreciated. Because of their success last January, the CSA's of Ottawa, Carleton, Algonquin and Queen's are very eager to join in. And by joining our efforts, we hope to have a rich and impressive presentation to the audience.

The China Week in Queen's will consist of the following programmes: Guest speaker; pictorial and cultural exhibitions, slide shows; film shows, work shop, table-tennis tournament, Cultural Night (a variety performance by local students and some external groups). The Exhibitions and slide shows will be in Mackintosh Corry Hall and West Campus. One tip is that the guest speaker will be Shirley McLaine or Felix Greene.

One can see that the China Week is a very meaningful project. It not only facilitates Canadians as well as non-Canadians to understand the life and culture of the people in a country which has close to a quarter of the world's population, but also provides opportunities to promote friendship among students in the university. A number of Departments and Organizations are already very interested in the programmes and are actively helping us to make the China Week successful. Let's all look forward to it.

And we very welcome your support, participation and advice!

Queen's Modern Dance Company

Dance Company scores with personality

by Eric Hughes

It is unfortunate that something as unique as the Queen's Modern Dance Company seems to get so little support from the university as a whole. They offer an alternative form of expression that can be found nowhere else on campus. There is a certain feel to modern dance, both for the dancer and for his audience, that is inimitable. It is a shame that the one group on campus that has the training and the drive to create this feeling is forced to perform in what is essentially a rehearsal space - but that seems to be their lot.

This is not to say that the Queen's Modern Dance Company does not make the best of things. On the contrary, they have wisely spent their meagre budget on some attractively made costumes and interestingly set up lights to create the needed audience-performer separation that is not found in the dance studio.

From the opening number it is clear that the group's main asset is its personality. They start with a bouncing, beating rock-like number and dance it with charm and pizzazz. So too do they pull back into the second routine - an adagio-smooth performance to "Le Piano sous La Mer".

The only criticism I would voice about these two numbers - both danced by the five members of the company, (Suzanne Cross, Sarah Dickie, Denise Huyler, Nancy McNaughton and Pamela Tate), is that the choreography tends to be repetitive and at times tedious. However, the dancers themselves make up for this lack of variety by selling the routines non-stop.

The next number, in which the company was joined by its director-choreographer Sandra Aitken, was a step up. There was a much stronger expressive quality to this routine - aided in no small measure by Miss Aitken's amazing face and body. The dancers moved in a snowy whiteness with tight, spare motions. It was here that the company seemed most together, (after some initial shakiness). They really started to move as one.

After the interval, Ms. Aitken did a short music-box solo, "Farewell to a Friend". It was, I found, a moving bit of expression - short, to the point and very unusual in its sharpness and simplicity.

"Exodus" to the music of Leonard Bernstein's "The Dybbuk" was the company's tour de force. The story was strong, (Nazi atrocities during W.W. II), and the movement was equal to it. In simple peasant-like costumes, they moved both lyrically and militaristically, pointing out the essential conflicts - but still keeping them out of the control of the victims. There was a strong series of movement motifs to set-up and punctuate the action. Despite a technical breakdown 3/4 of the way through, the number was the high point of the evening.

The Queen's Modern Dance Company has a good idea of what it does well. Their ensemble dancing is rarely sloppy, but still allows for individual expression by each dancer. I would certainly like to see them dance some more difficult works - some dancing that gets them off the ground, some dancing with a touch more variety. However, their present show is well worth the viewing. They truly can express themselves without words.

The show continues tonight and tomorrow night at 8:30pm, and Sunday at 7:30pm at the dance studio on the second floor of the Phys-Ed centre. Tickets are $2.00.

Ted Nugent has a "Free for All"

by Sandy Graham

Chances are if you were asked to name the world's greatest living rock guitarist you'd suggest Beck, Clapton, Gallagher or Trower. How about the world's most energetic guitarist? That's right, Ted Nugent, the king of kick-ass guitar rock. "Free For All", his latest album, proves once again that there is not a raunchier or more outrageous player in the business.

Return with one for a moment to the year 1968. If you were old enough to have discovered vinyl by that date (I certainly wasn't) you may recall a shattering number one single, "Journey to the Centre of the Mind", by the Amboy Dukes. Ted Nugent played abrasive lead guitar for the Detroit based Dukes back in the wild and wonderful late sixties and built a reputation as one of the more wild and wonderful. In fact, he admits he was totally obnoxious. Although the band didn't last long after that single, Nugent kept on playing with a vengeance. He was lost however in the shuffle of the decades and the change to seventies soft rock. It wasn't really until last year and the release of "Stormtroopin'" on Epic records that Ted Nugent re-emerged still clad in leather and skins and hand brandishing his Gibson Bryndland with that same crazed look in his eyes.

"Free For All" is an exercise in mania. Each cut is a hard-driving monster with which one must grapple inside his headphones. The battle is exhausting but satisfying because you know you're being conquered by the most powerful of beasts. Nugent doesn't relax for a moment. "Together" is the album's slowest track and represents his best attempt at interpreting a love song. Even so, it's a very physical effort, distinguished by a high, whining guitar line that just refuses to die. The solo is a hypnotic wail that produces a very ominous, melodramatic feeling, which is enhanced by a passionate vocal line. In this cut, Nugent sounds very much like Kensington Market's Luke

Gibson did: warm but in a very tragic, ethereal sense.

Nugent has got to be the hardest working guitarist around simply because he crams three and four guitars into places others would consider too small. "Hammerdown" is a good example of this policy. A full-tilt rocker, it is bursting with sixties-style madness, flavoured with a good deal of distortion. From the opening roar, Nugent's guitar takes off never to return. Self-respecting guitarists just don't do things like that one does, but it probably lives by the words of its owner: "If in doubt, I got me a rock and roll band".

"Free For All", the album's opening track, illustrates Nugent's supreme ability to make the most repetitious rhythms sound searing and innovative. Each measure is crammed with a thousand slashes and topped off with a bubbling solo. Unlike other performers who seem to die when the going gets tough (such as Bad Co.), Nugent thrives on straightforward full-blown music. "Dog eat Dog" starts traditionally: one bar of pulsating guitar on the left channel, another on the right, followed by a pounding bass and drums. It's all Nugent's needs to get going, and he delivers a satisfying mixture of high and low explorations. "Writing on the Wall" is his best effort. In it he wrenches distorted protests from his guitars and lays them over some rapid gun-fire like bursts of sound, reminiscent of Hendrix's "Machine Gun".

There is nothing intellectually stimulating about Ted Nugent's music. His whole philosophy is illustrated in the photographic sequence on the inside cover: a long haired madman grimacing as he clutches all six strings of his guitar, having pulled them completely off the board. If the picture won't convince you, just listen to the frenzied runs at the end of "Turn It Up". This album is definitely "ears only".

One of the main characteristics of musicians is the recognition and classification of their particular 'style' by fellow artists and their followers. Just as the music they compose is perceived as a form of stimulation by both, many artists and listeners find themselves fully integrated into this style. The key difference here is that although both may be continually reinforced through the music, the artist is dependent upon the music and its acceptance, for his and his family's survival. For the artist, composing and playing music is a perfect occupation, combining work with pleasure. However, in accordance with Maslow's hierarchy of needs, physiological factors must first be satisfied before any concept of satisfaction will occur. The bread and water syndrome is all too familiar to many jazz artists who were trying to establish themselves in New York throughout the 40's and 50's, during the time when their new style of music was gradually becoming integrated and accepted by society. Many of these artists who had strived for so long, watched with awe many unknown artists turn from rags to riches overnight through the advent of the 'rock' style of music. It is not really surprising then, that many traditionally-known jazzmen jumped on the electrified bandwagon, and started to integrate themselves into this new and different sound that contrasted their past styles so abruptly. The typical case is well-known trumpeter Miles Davis who turned from the acoustic vibration to produce an album entitled "Bitches Brew", featuring other traditionally known jazzmen as Jack DeJohnette, Wayne Shorter, Chic Corea, Airtio Moreira, plus now well-known guitarist John McLaughlin, who performed with the first jazz-rock band of the Sixties called the Tony Williams Lifetime. This spurred many other jazz personalities into changing their style to the electric sound, and to come closer to realizing more fame and fortune than they ever had before. It was at this time the term 'selling-out' became known among jazz people, and the frequency of its use paralleled the popularity this new fusion music enjoyed. Thus, a new style of music was integrated into the music market. For traditional jazzmen the cost of 'cashing-in' was their past reputation and style plus their acceptance by traditional jazz devotees. In a sense, many jazz personalities viewed this selling-out as a stain on their colleagues' honour, but as many realized, not all stains are permanent, since the freedom and creativity of their colleagues' compositions was still evident.

In the past three to four years, a further development in the 'selling-out'

Selling out or cashing in?

'cashing-in' formula has been observed, as the funk sound has become more prevalent. The funk-beat formed another dimension in music, and was accepted and popularized extremely rapidly in its initial stages. Many critics hypothesized that this dimension would only exist temporarily as so many other dimensions - jazz, rock, and jazz-rock - were being focussed on so heavily at the time. It would appear that the critics may have been guilty of their regrettable sin-making to hasty a judgement, evidenced by the current popularity of disco music. Once again, many artists were viewed as selling-out, not only from the jazz-rock genre, but also from the rock-orientated styles as well, to accommodate the market demand, and take advantage of the associated fame and fortune (ie. cashing-in). For example, a large number of artists recording on the CTI label such as George Benson, Hubert Laws, Freddie Hubbard to mention a few, made the transgression towards the funk sound, as many segments of recording companies seem to be doing now. I find the term 'selling-out' and all of its associated devaluing connotations, a little too harsh to be placed on artists, especially since many artists have exploited the parameterless dimensions of the electric sound and combinations of it with other instruments into styles and forms of music that have never been previously actualized. On the other side, I don't relish hearing about one of my favourite artists changing styles to the funk-era (being obviously negatively biased towards this style of music) or similarly, for an individual who enjoys disco music to find out his favourite artist has changed his style to the avant-garde jazz regime (no offence intended to any avant-garde devotees).

Perhaps the long overdue exposure many of these artists have failed to obtain in the past, will become a reality. Sure it's disappointing, to see favourite artists making changes that don't agree with your individual tastes, but it must be remembered that for them music and style provide a pathway to subsistence and associated life styles, where for the audience, music is merely a form of entertainment.

Artists' individual styles can be stained, but the emergence of new styles from this stain will provide some form of stimulating entertainment for someone else, if this new style is personally disliked. The 'selling-out' - 'cashing-in' function is a part of everyone's life at some point. Think about it the next time you borrow a friend's notes to photocopy!

Les Grands Ballets Canadiens.

A mixed bag of ballet

by Tony Pepper

Among other things, ballet is the personification of music; its themes and variations. It is the physical articulation of an abstract art form. It necessitates skill and imagination, talent and sensitivity on the part of both a company's dancers and its choreographer. Les Grands Ballets is fortunate to be endowed in all these respects. Artistic Director Brian Macdonald is internationally known for his choreographic compositions.

Four pieces were performed last Monday and Tuesday evening. The first being Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake". Les Grands Ballets is a very faithful interpretation. Guided by choreographer Ivanov's deep conviction for the more melancholy strains of Tchaikovsky's music, we are presented not only with Robert Prevost's magnificent Gothic set of intertwining thorn trees embracing the ruins of a cathedral, and Wendell Dennis's surrealistic costumes of feathers and white chiffon, but with such a sonorous rendition of Tchaikovsky's score, that it seemed almost Wagnerian.

Despite the ephemeral attractions of the ballet, it was really not very good. "Swan Lake" is without a doubt too grand a vehicle for the Grand Theatre's diminutive stage. It requires a depth and a width of performance area our community centre can not well afford. Whenever the company appeared ensemble, they were ridiculously cramped. Heads and legs would disappear behind curtains, and the dancers would quite unwittingly be upstaged by their over-crowded colleagues.

I am assuming that the problems experienced with stage area hindered the dancers' performances last Monday night. I should not like to think such an important ballet company would otherwise dance a classical ballet so sloppily. The soloists, Sonia Vartanian (Odette), David La Hay (Prince Siegfried), and Maurice Lemay (Von Rothbart) did well enough. Indeed, Miss Vartanian has exceptional style, and danced quite brilliantly. The Four Swans' interlude, danced with spirit by Karen Brown, Cathy Buchanan, Reva Piusosoff and Christiane Beradelli was also very enjoyable. But the Company ensemble was horrific. It lacked spark, organization, and in general the dancing was unconvincing.

George Balanchine's "Concerto Barocco" (1941) is a ballet of great sensitivity. Classical in dimension, it becomes truly timeless through performance. Fluid intricacies, sleekly dressed dancers weaving through the movements of J.S. Bach's, "Concerto in D Minor for Two Violins", gives the ballet its ethereal spirit. It is a celebration of life, la joie de vivre.

A superbly performed ballet by all, it provided a relieving contrast to the heavy clumsiness of "Swan Lake".

Continuing in this more enthusiastic vein, the succinct "Lines and Points", a double Pas de Deux to Pierre Mercure's "tone poem", inspired humour through the frivolity and playfulness of the jousting pairs of dancers. The starkness of the stage, the contrasting colours of the dancers' costumes, the geometric jests and acrobatic contortions they challenge each other with, all add to the innocence and good humour of the piece.

"Time Out of Mind" is Brian Macdonald's award-winning tribute to animal lust and the mating rites of the human species. Danced to the pounding rhythm of Paul Creston's music, against Fernand Toupin's drop of surging red passion, Macdonald explores sexual desire in a continuous lunge of expressionistic movements.

I first saw "Time Out of Mind" last May at O'Keefe Centre. I was not greatly impressed with the work at that time, thinking incredibly overblown, and very over done. When I saw the ballet performed again last Monday evening, I realized my former bad opinion of piece had arisen from a lack of communication. What "Swan Lake" lost on the Grand's stage "Time Out of Mind" definitely gained. The immediacy and carnality of the piece is forced upon the viewer in the smaller theatre, whereas in Toronto, the potency of the ballet was lost in the immensity of O'Keefe.

I regretted the absence of Maniwa Barredo, the brilliant ballerina who has figured so prominently in the company's repertory in recent years.

I also regret the absence of great ballet Monday's performance was entertaining, sometimes remarkable, but in no way flawless.

Bews News: Hockey

by Mike Guinlok

Hockey has concluded for this first term with very few surprises. Arts 77 is still ranked number one; however, they do not appear to have the scoring power to win another championship. Their defence continues to play well, aided by strong backchecking and goaltending, but they cannot continue to win games 2-1. Meds has moved into the number two spot. Unlike Arts 77 they have had no trouble scoring goals and have won big twice. Led by Gord Porter, Cam Boyd and Chris Wallace, Meds could finish number one in its division and the league.

Their stiffest competition comes from third ranked Commerce 79 who have the most balanced line-up in the circuit. Robin Riley, Gord Nixon, John Guinlok and Tony Manasterky form a hard-hitting defence corps, and Steve Flesch, Ian Gray and Scott Brown pick up any scoring slack. 79's only weakness may be in goal where Tim Price suffers from lack of action. The fourth ranked team, and probably the most physical in the league, is Arts 78. Behind the strong goaltending of Ross Pearman, 78 should finish second in Division #1, but they lack the scoring power to win a championship. Number five ranked Commerce 78 and number six ranked PHE both boast fast skating, well-balanced teams. PHE is very strong at forward but weak in goal. 78 relies on the scrappy forechecking of Ian Burkholder, the big shot of Guy Casgrain and strong goaltending.

Arts 77, Arts 78 and Commerce 78 have all played each other in Division 1 in the first term, but Commerce 79, Meds and PHE still have to play each other before the play-offs which should provide some good action in Division II next term.

Administrative Notes. Any unit, independent or otherwise who wishes to enter a team in ball hockey, basketball, curling ($12.00 fee), waterpolo or (2) bowling ($7.50 per team bond) must do so by 3:30 p.m. on Thursday, December 9th. The new one month suspension rule does not begin until January 10th, 1977.

oh what Kevin Treacy [16] and the Gaels wouldn't give for just one more shot.

Hockey Gaels unable to take Gee-Gees

by Jean Bangay

At the end of Tuesday night's hockey game at Ottawa's Sandy Hill arena, no one on the Queen's bench could believe that the score was really 2-1 in favour of the Ottawa Gee-Gees. The Gaels were certainly the superior team as they out-hustled, outshot (29-26), but were unable to outscore a vastly improved Ottawa club. It was a great team effort, but unfortunately all the work did not pay off on the scoreboard.

There were no goals in the first period, although Dale Sandles let go with a terrific shot near the 15 minute mark which almost got by the Ottawa goalie, Gino Yanire. The Gaels were hit early with two overlapping penalties, but some determined forechecking by Ned and John MacIntyre allowed them to emerge from a two-man disadvantage with the scoreless tie intact. Actually, the penalties that were called were few; it was the lack of penalty calls that caused some frustration on the part of both teams. In that first period, Ottawa was called for highsticking the puck (although a similar call was let go in the second) and the Queen's power play just couldn't get anything going.

The Gaels came out in the second period really hustling, and some persistent forechecking and setting up by the line of Bill VanCamp, John MacIntyre and Dale Sandles seemed to give the Gaels an edge. But a shot from the point deflected by Dave Dines managed to get by Queen's goalie Andy Schell and put the Gee-Gees up one. Two dubious penalties were effectively killed off by some steady work in the defending end by defence partners Jay Babcock and Glenn Furgoch and (once again) the MacIntyre brothers. Despite a strong power play effort by Willie Wing, Terry Angel and Kevin Treacy late in the period, they just could not get the puck in the Ottawa net.

It appeared that an Ottawa power play goal by Kevin Benson early in the third period with Bill VanCamp off for hooking might deflate the Gaels a bit, but this was definitely not the case. They came on strong late in the period with all lines really hustling, and it paid off with a goal by Terry Angel from Earl Moulton and captain Frank Coffey, on a shot from the slot that was anything but "scintillating." Frustration with the unco-operative puck and referees flared only in the last minute of the game when Gaels Joe Pecanic and Jay Babcock took on Ottawa's Kevin Bowie and Dan Anderson. With Andy Schell out of the net, and an extra man on the ice, it appeared that the Gaels were really going to tie it up, and a shot by Kevin Treacy deep in the Gee-Gee's end almost did just that. After three good chances (the result of some persistent checking in the Ottawa end) time ran out for the Gaels, and the game ended at 2-1 in favour of the Gee-Gees.

The game was never out of reach for the Gaels, but they were victim to some dubious refereeing and an extremely capricious puck, not to mention the hot goaltending (though that was evident at both ends of the ice). It was a frustrating game to lose, but the Gaels certainly gave it everything they had. The Queen's fans (who, incidentally, almost filled the stands behind the Gaels' bench and some of whom came from as far away as Hazelton, Annapolis and even Newfoundland) were witnesses to a solid team effort and a very exciting game. This weekend the league-leading York Yeomen are in town to meet the Gaels at Jock Hart's Arena.

W-polo finishes "outstanding" season in 2nd place

by Brian Clarke

"Shoot hard!" These two words of encouragement by Queen's water polo coach Simon Beitler were heard time and time again by all the Gaels water polo players this season but will be especially remembered by Mike Fox and Bruce Everden.

Fox and Everden played their last two games as members of the Queen's University Golden Gaels water polo team at the OUAA championships last Saturday here. Next year the two will not be returning to Queen's.

For four years Fox played with the team, being once rookie of the year, once most outstanding player on the team, and this season captain of the Gaels, while Everden was with the team three years.

All things considered, the Gaels turned out one of their best performances in Ontario University Athletic Association water polo this season, finishing second in the Eastern Section.

"I feel they are the best team that I have ever coached," said coach Beitler. "In fact they should be just as good or better next year."

In the six years Beitler has coached Queen's it has finished second three times before, and first twice in the OUAA East. Even though the Gaels were not number one this season second is quite respectable considering the improvement in the quality of water polo being played in recent years.

"At the beginning of the season I started with eight new players, but everybody was really trying," said coach Beitler.

Queen's was awarded the Canadian University Challenge Cup at the McMaster University Water Polo Tournament for being the most improved team, and although in the OUAA finals it was defeated twice, freshman goalie Richard Grew received the outstanding goaltender trophy.

Coach Beitler believes that he will have a very good team next year too, with most of his players returning. In particular he looks to Peter Trebus and Dave Ardell, both experienced veterans to be the pillar of his squad. Also back next season will be Mitch Dent and Graeme Black. Both players were selected to play for the Ontario Junior Water Polo Team this year and coach Beitler believes the experience they will get from playing with them will be most beneficial.

In the meantime, from now until next season, Coach Beitler intends to keep his Gaels in practice. Queen's has entered two teams in the Ottawa Valley Water Polo League which will begin play after the Christmas break. The players will continue to hold practices between noon and 2 p.m. on Saturdays.

Queen's will play about 14 games in this league with the possibility of qualifying to the Ontario Water Polo Association finals with a good showing against its competitors.

Next season should be even more competitive in the OUAA also. Three other universities, Carleton, Ottawa, and Guelph are expected to enter teams in the league. This expansion of the league could encourage the re-scheduling of the university league season.

At a recent meeting of OUAA water polo officials held at Queen's on Nov. 27, Beitler suggested that the season be extended until mid-February. It was realized that this might conflict with swim teams, but it was felt that it would be a prime step in the development of university water polo.

Regardless of these moves which should increase the occurrence of water polo play at Queen's, coach Beitler sticks to the same philosophy about the game and the university player. "I recognize that my players are first here for study and that should come first. Water polo should come second. And when you play the game it's not always winning that's important, but that you enjoy playing the game."

Darrell Penner The Perfect All-Canadian

characteristics of the CIAU All-Canadian athlete. He is an excellent football player capable of performing well at any position on offence or defence, but outstanding in the defensive backfield and in the kicking game. His excellence is the result of a happy combination of God-given physical talent and a mentality which demands perfection in every facet of his performance.

He is an excellent medical student, a gentleman, an athlete, and a leader by personal example. Darrell typifies the definition of a CIAU All-Canadian.

Darrell Penner over his 23 years has proven to be one of those very fortunate few who is bound to be the best at whatever he tries. With 185 pounds spread over a muscular 5 ft. 11 inches Penner has the size attributes necessary for athletic success. However he certainly does not conform to the "dumb jock image" because as he so aptly put it, after being questioned as to what he thought of his reputation as a "genuine jock", "If you had asked me that on the air I would have said: Well, I certainly ain't no dummy, if that's what you mean."

Penner's intellect has not only been converted into football sense or what his teammates refer to as "a nose for the ball" but it has more importantly enabled him to pass through the rigours of Queen's Meds, in which he is in his third year, with relative ease despite the burden self-imposed on his time by athletics. Darrell says at the moment he is just concerned about making it through school but is hoping to become involved in the relatively new but the very needy field of sport medicine.

If participation and achievement in sports are any indication of how successful "Penzie" will be when he becomes Darrell Penner M.D., then the Thunder Bay native should be an expert in his field in no time for he has starred in even more sports than they offer in the Superstars contests.

The Queen's hockey gaels see action tonight as the visiting York University Yeomen play Queen's tonight in the Jock Hartly Arena at 8 p.m.

In swimming he began by setting a Canadian age group record in the backstroke and has since broken Thunder Bay, Manitoba and Minnesota records before setting two individual and one relay swim marks in his first two years at Queen's. He is an accomplished golfer and an all star home-run leading catcher in senior baseball after having played on three Canadian Championship little league teams.

At Westgate Collegiate he earned his team's Most Valuable Player award once in basketball and thrice in football. He held the district record in hurdles and 4x110 yd. relay as well as the high school pole vault mark. In his spare time Darrell won a city badminton championship and stood twice on two other occasions.

He was a high school Valedictorian and earned an entrance scholarship to Queen's of which his father Orville "Bobo" Penner is a graduate.

Darrell was Queen's freshman athlete of the year in 1972 and on the OUA all-star team in football from 1973-1976 as well as winner of the Johnny Evans Trophy for MVP in 1974 and 1975. Undoubtedly more awards will follow this year for the two time All-Canadian.

The future looks bright for Darrell Penner as after next year he will not only have his M.D. but he will also have a pro-football career waiting for him if he so chooses. The Edmonton Eskimos drafted him in 1975 and Darrell recently informed them he is still interested for 1978.

Frank Tindall, most highly respected coach at Queen's for 29 years echoed my feelings when he stated, "On a personal basis, I would say that Mr. Penner is probably the most outstanding individual that I have seen at Queen's."

People's peace prize

Although the Nobel Peace Prize was not awarded this year, the citizens of Norway gave $325,000 in individual contributions to the leaders of the women's peace movement in Ireland, Maire Corry and Betty Williams. They were presented with the prize at a ceremony in Oslo's seaside town hall.

Quotas on clothing

The Canadian government has imposed new import quotas on imported clothing. A spokesman for the Canadian Importers Association predicted the controls will increase prices 'beyond belief'.

Federal Industry Minister Jean Chretien, said the new quotas would result in only marginal price increases, and save thousands of jobs in the Canadian textiles industry.

Execution on

The Utah Pardons Board ruled 2-1 not to commute the death sentence of Gary Gilmore. His trial judge is expected to set a new date for execution fairly quickly. If he is executed, he will be the first person in the United States to be executed in 10 years.

The board heard arguments from anti-capital punishment groups, who argued that the state would be helping Gilmore commit suicide if they executed him. Mr. Gilmore told the board chairman, George Latimer, that all he had to say to such groups is "bug out. It's my life and my death".

Mr. Latimer said the majority of the board had reached the decision after deciding the state's capital punishment law was constitutional, and that Gilmore had been properly tried and sentenced.

Scottish self-rule

The British Labor government has unveiled plans to give Scotland and Wales a limited amount of home rule. The measure, called the Devolution Bill, was prompted by growing nationalist sentiment in Scotland and Wales.

The bill calls for separate legislative assemblies in Scotland and Wales, each with powers to make laws and spend money in a wide variety of fields. Michael Foot, The Government House Leader, stressed that the bill is designed to preserve the United Kingdom, not to initiate its break-up. The bill is expected to receive stiff opposition in the House.

Dollar drops

The Canadian dollar dropped to 96.49 cents in U.S. dollars at the end of trading on Tuesday. On Monday it dropped 18 cents, the sharpest one-day decline since May 3, 1962.

Tuesday, the dollar dropped dramatically to 95.88 cents, before levelling off and remaining steady. The steadiness may be an indication of more stability in its rate.

Some of the nervousness in the foreign exchange market may disappear as Quebec Premier Rene Levesque seems content to work within the existing constitutional framework for the moment, and has chosen his cabinet.

Finance Minister Donald MacDonald, verified that the Bank of Canada had intervened to stabilize the value of the Canadian dollar. He added that the dollar was expected to fall because it was overpriced.

Expensive ski jumps

The Ontario Government has spent over half a million dollars building two ski jumps in Thunder Bay, on land that it does not own. There are presently less than 18 years left in the lease that the province has with Little Norway Ski Resort, the private company that owns the land. The Government normally builds only on property that it owns, or else demands a 99 year lease. The ski jumps have an estimated life of forty to fifty years.

The Government may possibly make a gift of the jumps to the ski resort since there is over a million dollars worth of work to be done on the jumps before they will be able to pay for themselves, and none of the provincial ministries appear eager to take over the cost.

The Government was persuaded to build the jumps in 1972 through the efforts of a former MPP who had invested money in the ski resort, and was on its board of directors until 1970.

Female priests

The first women priests of the Anglican Church of Canada were ordained on Tuesday. A total of six women became priests in three separate ceremonies in Toronto, London, Ont., and British Columbia. There has been a long controversy within the church about allowing women into the priesthood; last year a general assembly of church members finally decided to allow their ordination. However the bishop of a diocese has the right to refuse to ordain a woman into his area if he is against the idea of women priests.

Actress dies

Rosalind Russell, well known for her role as Auntie Mame in the movie of the same name, died at the beginning of the week at the age of 63. Miss Russell played in a wide range of movie roles during her career, ranging from a society woman to a judge and a college dean.

Amherst Island fires

Since April there have been five fires at the west end of Amherst Island. Residents, police and firemen all suspect arson, and one man was arrested Tuesday. Four fires ravaged the house and barn of Charles and Elsie Densem, and a fifth fire burned out the house of one of their neighbors.

At first an electrical outlet was thought to be the cause of the fires, but they followed each other so closely, three occurring in three days, that arson seems likely.

The Densems are a very well-liked couple on the island. They have lived there twenty years, and are now retired. Despite the fires they are planning to stay, and friends are providing accommodation and help.

Health Sciences Complex

The health sciences complex is progressing well. The new emergency department of KGH will open March 1, two months before planned. The new cancer clinic and rehabilitation medicine department will be ready in June. The first third of the interior of the basic sciences library will probably be ready by March, 1978, and the rest of the building will be built as money becomes available.

Besides the rest of the basic sciences library the only projects that are still on the drawing board are those for a new wing at KGH and at Hotel Dieu Hospital. To date the health sciences complex council has given out more than thirty-three million dollars for renovation and building work. KGH will eventually be allotted about $26 million for its new wing, and the new wing at Hotel Dieu Hospital will probably cost about $16 million.

Tougher attitude

Judge Delisle, a provincial judge working in Kingston, has declared that it is time for a new attitude towards first offenders, especially if they are convicted of break-in and theft.

He sentenced two first-time offenders last week. A sixteen-year-old youth received a sixty-day intermittent sentence and an eighteen-year-old a thirty day jail sentence, both on the charge of break-in and enter. Judge Delisle's chief concern is the attitude of youths who think that they will automatically receive a suspended sentence and probation for a first offence. It could be this attitude that is prompting the recent increase in break-ins in Kingston and in neighboring cottage areas.

Advance polls

Advance polls were held Saturday for the December 6 municipal elections. 663 people showed up to vote at the seven polls for the city and the two townships concerned. In 1974 394 people voted and in 1972 361 cast their votes at advance polls.

Officials do not have any particular reasons to offer for this relatively high turnout, but good weather could have prompted some people to vote on that day. Hopefully the actual turnout on December 6 will be better than that on election day in 1974 when only 22.5 percent of Kingston's electorate voted.

Odd news

York is trimming its traditional Christmas tree. Instead of last year's Queen's sends first Rhodes woman

Terry Collins

Jessie Sloan, a fourth year geology student at Queen's has become the first female ever in Ontario to win a Rhodes Scholarship. The announcement came last Sunday from the Rhodes Scholarship committee in Toronto who interviewed 20 Ontario candidates.

This was the first year women were eligible to receive a Rhodes Scholarship. Ms. Sloan intends to study Politics, Economics and Philosophy when she gets to Oxford.

The scholarships are given to students around the world and covers virtually all expense while at Oxford. The other recipient was Mr. John Floris, a medical student in Toronto. Miss Sloan lives in Ottawa.

Judged on the basis of academic achievement and extra-curricular involvement, Ms. Sloan has outstanding grades at Queen's and has been a member of several committees in the Geology department recently including a search committee for a department head of Geological sciences. Ms. Sloan said that she did not play any team sports but she enjoys running at the Queen's track.

Principal R.L. Watts told the Journal Sunday night that he had received a call from a member of the selection committee who told him "Jessie Sloan had been very impressive" in her interview last Saturday. Dr. Watts said, "I'd want to congratulate her very heartily, not only as Principal of Queen's, but as a former Rhodes Scholar myself." The Principal noted that the Ontario Rhodes scholarships are the most difficult to obtain in Canada as there are 15 universities competing for two provincial awards.

Last year two Queen's students, one from British Columbia and one from Newfoundland, received Rhodes' scholarships.

Municipal election: results from last night

Denis Champagne

Ken Keyes won a resounding victory in the mayoralty race in Kingston yesterday. Mr. Keyes obtained 9,407 votes with runner-up Kit Spence scoring 1,112 votes, followed by Mr. Phipps-Walker with 840 and Mr. Guindon receiving 163 votes.

The leading candidates for the various aldermanic positions, at press time were as follows: - Mr. Breen and Mr. Hawkins firmly secured representation in Frontenac ward. St. Lawrence Ward will be represented for the next two years by Messrs. Webb and Gorham. An extremely close race left Sydenham Ward a toss-up until a recount establishes the two winners, with Lois Miller leading, followed by Mr. French and Mr. Knapp respectively, with approximately a 13-vote difference separating them.

Aldermen MacKenzie and Timmins were acclaimed in Rideau Ward. Victoria Ward will be represented by incumbent alderman Gerretson and a newcomer, Mr. Taronweck. Ontario Ward was the closest in election results with a gap of only 14 votes separating the three candidates, Messrs. Allmark, Clements and Travers.

The public school board will be represented by Laverty, Bannister, Doubleday, Warrington, Watts, Watson and Miller. Seats on the Separate school board were won by Clement, Lamarche, Fardella, Kennedy, Shea, Cossee and Travill.

Voter turnout was comparable to other years, according to one spokesman. Municipal election turnouts in recent years in Kingston have ranged from 22.2 percent in 1974, to 33.2 percent in 1972. This was the first time that all municipal elections in Ontario have been held on the same day.

Quebec and University finance

In his monthly column, Principal R.L. Watts discusses this week's renegotiation in Ottawa of the Fiscal Arrangements Act which governs university financing. These negotiations will be the first between the Parti Quebecois and the Federal government.

The stress on exams

Exams seem to be uppermost in students' minds these days. With the impending rush to review material, people get particularly moody and short with others. The pressure to do well is seldom greater than during this period and again in April.

Many faculties place great emphasis on the results one achieves under exam conditions. For example, several arts courses allocate no less than half of one's final mark on the Christmas examinations. In Commerce, where only half courses are offered, an entire term's mark can depend on one's success or failure during a three hour test. The psychological difference between writing a 50 per cent exam and a 100 per cent exam is another matter.

The practice of dismissing one's academic grades in one motion - like having to swallow one big bitter pill - is not truly fair to the student. People will argue that the student who is diligent in his studies all term will do just as well if his mark is apportioned throughout the term or is weighted heavily on an examination. But what of the student who does not do well under extreme pressure? Perhaps few in number, these students are victims of a grading system which will not truly measure their academic merit.

Professor Peter Taylor attacked the grading system in his Red Book for Queen's published earlier this year. He said students in class strive to transcribe as much of a lecture as possible. Later they would "learn" the material and spew it out to the best of their recollection during an examination. Although this description is something of a caricature, in practice his words ring quite true.

Who benefits from this system? The student who most obviously gains is the one who can cram efficiently and retain the necessary information for a few days.

Surely it is most reasonable to test students in any faculty on a frequent basis to ensure that the fundamental elements of a curriculum are being mastered. Ideally, at the conclusion of the course one would be able to articulate the way these components fit together to form a whole.

Can the student's ability to present an overview be assessed in any other fashion than an examination? We admit, alternatives do not spring to mind. Collective efforts are bound to undermine an alternative individual testing system. As much as we would like to think that students would realize the educational worthlessness of cooperation on take home exams, the temptation to follow this practice is understandably irresistible at times.

Exams, then too, have their place in the educational system. We would urge though, that less emphasis be placed on them by those professors who persist in according huge values to examination results.

The honour of Rhodes

We wish to congratulate Jessie Sloan upon being awarded one of the two Rhodes Scholarships for 1977. This, the most prestigious and meaningful of academic awards, is granted on the basis of superior scholarship and personal achievement. That Jessie should be our third Rhodes scholar in three years is unique, that she should be Ontario's first female Rhodes Scholar is a great honour.

As Principal Watts stated, Jessie and Queen's can both be proud. For this, like the two Rhodes scholarships granted last year serves as a fine tribute to the academic eminence of Queen's university.

Quiet era at Queen's

The end of a year, a good time for a general reflection and prediction for 1977.

The past year was a quiet one at Queen's. With few exceptions things have run smoothly on campus - perhaps an indication of a general mood at Queen's. A decade ago unprecedented growth disrupted the normal atmosphere one could expect at an academic institution. Today the university seems to be solidifying its position and getting back to devoting full attention to the education of students.

For next year we envision little change. The government has provided sufficient funds for the university to hold its own against inflation. With this financial balance the distractions of the past will be less in evidence.

It is a good time to be at Queen's.

On that note, the Journal would like to extend its best wishes to all for a happy holiday season and a prosperous new year. Good luck on the exams

Outer Council goes with opinion poll

AMS changes its policy

Tim Greenwood

The AMS Outer Council voted against reaffirming their support of the principle of free tuition last Thursday night. A lively debate preceded the vote during which considerable attention was paid to the results of the opinion poll attached to the November referendum, which revealed that the majority of those polled were opposed to free tuition.

Paul Steep, AMS vice president opened the discussion in support of free tuition saying that they were talking about just free tuition not other costs or social motivational factors. He pointed out that tuition fees cover only 16 percent of educational costs so that their removal would not represent an appreciable cost to the government.

Kathy Wood the other vice president argued that the AMS was morally bound by the opinion poll to oppose free tuition. She felt that tuition fees were not an insurmountable barrier but a hurdle that could be overcome, and that social pressures played a more important role than financial ones in deciding who went to university. Ms. Wood said that the institution of free tuition "would not be Utopia, but myopia." Jamie Avis, President of the AMS felt that it would be "a real shot in the arm" to get rid of the matter of free tuition once and for all. He said that the AMS could not argue convincingly in support of free tuition before the government, if they both knew the AMS was not backed by its student body. With the present social conditions free tuition would just reinforce the benefits the more affluent families already enjoy, Mr. Avis suggested. He said that Ontario's program of student awards, despite its needs for improvement represents the most equitable way of improving accessibility to post-secondary education.

Bill Burgess and Hugh Christie shared the opinion that the corporations should cover tuition costs since they benefited by the acquisition of graduates Mr Burgess argued that post-secondary education was a social right and that with the present standard of living in Canada, society could afford to pay for it. Mr. Christie felt that free tuition would offer new opportunities for lower income groups so that one day "a garbage collector" might "become a lawyer".

Mr. Atkinson conceded that there probably would never be free tuition, but argued for its support in order to give the AMS a position from which to logically argue against tuition increases. He also argued that the AMS did not have to adhere to the opinion poll as its results were not statistically valid.

Mr. Lalonde suggested that free tuition might have been justified in the past when a university education almost guaranteed a job, but not today, when so many graduates were unemployed and therefore a burden on society. He said that Canada should not support students, "students should support Canada".

Paul Steep

Paul Steep closed the debate with a rebuttal of Kathy Wood, reading a research report which spoke of tuition fees not as hurdles, but as barriers. He noted that everybody was pointing out how the income tax structure was wrong but few had pointed out what was wrong with free tuition.

UK unsure about EEC

by Anne Johnson

Britain's colonial heritage has affected her relations with Europe and the United States. The setback which Britain suffered through Prime Minister Eden's ineptness at handling the Suez crisis in 1956, caused a turning point in its foreign policies.

Following the crisis, Britain was forced to repair its relations with the United States at the cost of damaging relations with the rest of Europe - especially France. For the French, this was confirmation of their feeling that Britain - was unreliable as a suitable participant in a European economic trade agreement according to Dr. Nailer, an ex-member of the British Ministry of Defence in a lecture here last Thursday.

A further side effect, said Nailer occurred within Britain. It produced a deep and lasting split in public opinion towards foreign policy. Before the crisis, the general public was under the "illusion" that their leaders were acting in their best interests. However, they soon developed a suspicion of their leaders which widened the gap between the "little Englanders" - those who wished to break all colonial ties in order to direct all attention to internal affairs - and the Commonwealth advocates, who felt England should uphold its responsibilities to its fellow Commonwealth countries. Both of these sentiments worked against the possibility of Britain's entrance into the EEC.

Nailer felt that the British can not yet see the EEC as a meaningful foreign policy objective. The question of where to go next has not been given a clear answer. Nailer feels that the most realistic path is that of moving closer to the EEC, but also said it would probably be quite a while before the rank and file fully accept that decision.

Dr. Nailer is currently Visiting Professor of Strategy at Carleton University, and will later be travelling to Australia to assume a similar post. Professor N. Orvik of Queen's Political Studies department, when contacted by the Journal, expressed his disappointment at the small turnout for the lecture, but admitted that it was a poor time of year to have scheduled it.

Rise in salaries "must be abated"

by Paul Finkel

The Senate Budget Review Committee has cited the upward trend in University salaries as an area for "great concern" warning that the trend "must be abated" before it leads to a situation where "the University is unable to function because of antiquated equipment, inadequate resources to support teaching, and a dilapidated and inadequate physical plant."

In its report presented to the Nov. 25 meeting of the Senate, the Committee offered a critical appraisal of Queen's operating budget for 1976-77, cautioning the university in various facets of its operation.

About 78 percent of this year's budget has been allocated for salaries pertaining to all university employees, a total increase of approximately 6 percent from last year. Conversely, the opposite trend has persisted in the category of "other expenditures", which includes capital equipment. Should matters continue in their present direction a predicament could develop, "in the not too distant future", where salaries absorb almost all financial resources available to the University.

The Report established this problem as "the most critical financial and academic issue which the University faces."

The Committee noted "with approval", the increased support awarded in the budget to the Library for 1976-77. The Library received almost two-thirds of the funds allocated to Academic Support Programs. However, the Committee expressed the opinion that "before" any future budget shifts were made in favour of the Library, "the rationale for acquisitions should be expressed in more quantitative and qualitative terms." The development of such rationale is to be the duty of the newly formed committee to advise the Principal on matters pertaining to the Library.

While recognising the short-run favourability of shifting budget expenditures into both Academic Support Programs and Instructional Programs (the Faculties and Schools of (University), the committee advised "strongly against" adopting this policy as a long-range strategy due to its depletion of relative resources allocated to Institutional Support and hence "its deleterious effect on the University's Physical Plant and other central services." While the Committee acknowledged that most reductions in budget allocations to Institutional Support reflected savings affected by the "judicious" work of the Physical Plant it felt that continued "depletion of the financial resources available to the Dept. of Physical Plant and indeed to other Central Services", could lead to "adverse effect on Staff morale" which would be difficult to reverse.

Other recommendations contained within the report included the need for the University "to provide a rationale for the discrepancies between resource allocations to various academic units in the University". (These "discrepancies" existing after the necessary calculations have been done to derive the Theoretical Support Staff Academic Staff Ratios), and also that there be "a clear statement of the academic objectives and priorities for Queen's University over the next five years."

In its conclusion the Senate Budget Review Committee expressed its approval of the existing budget (the 1976-77 budget was passed in April by the Board of Trustees and its report was voted as accepted by the Senate. Queen's projected operating budget for 1976-7 is approximately $52½ million dollars.

4 Canada Campus Notes

Attack on Chinese students termed racist

HAMILTON [CUP]—Two people were charged with assault Nov. 23 and further charges are pending after several groups of McMaster University Chinese students were subjected to what McMaster dean called racist attacks, Nov. 17.

In four separate incidents in the space of an hour the assailants threw Chinese student waiting for a bus to the ground and heaped physical and verbal abuse on three groups according to campus security.

"It is clearly a racist incident and we are doing everything within our means to put an end to it," said a McMaster dean.

"Incidents of this nature are abhorred on the campus whether students are involved or not," he said.

The attacks involved three men, all non-students, according to security. The men had been signed into the McMaster pub by two students and were thrown out for rowdiness at about 11 p.m. security said. The third man was not charged because he was "just watching" they said.

While no comment was reported from the student union, it suspended the students who signed the assailants into the bar from all union activities for the remainder of their term at the university.

One of the assaulted Chinese students was waiting at a bus stop with a group of other people and was singled out for attack according to witnesses. He was taken to the campus medical centre for treatment and later released.

The first altercation occurred off-campus when three Chinese students were accosted by three men who blocked their path and began verbally abusing them. One student fled back to campus on bicycle and returned with two other students to find his friends gone but the antagonists still there. The would-be rescuers were also subjected to verbal and physical abuse and chased back to the campus.

York U bans all South African wines

TORONTO [CUP]—All South African wines and brandies have been banned at York University following a complaint from 40 members of the university community to food services head, Norman Crandles.

A letter, dated Nov. 4, called on campus outlets to discontinue distribution of South African products.

"There is no reason why York University should help the balance of payments of a university condemned apartheid regime, whose very existence and constant actions are offenses against all concepts of human decency," it said.

York campus pubs agreed to discontinue sales of South African products as well as return all stock to suppliers.

Food Service's Crandles said his department was "simply responding to a reasonable request" and not making a political statement.

Funding frozen on grad research grants

TORONTO [CUP]—The Ontario government has decided to freeze all funding for new graduate research projects; one of the numerous recommendations in a Special Program Review report it voted on Nov. 23.

The original version of the 61-page document, also known as the McKeough-Henderson report, presented last November, focussed on government cutbacks of programs and alternative funding for post-secondary education.

The report was the subject of demonstrations and rallies on Ontario campuses last year because of its recommendations for an immediate 65 per cent increase in tuition fees and a raise in the student aid loan ceiling of $1,000 bringing it up to $1,800.

In addition to the two to three year freeze on new graduate research the government decided to discourage the use of academic achievement as a job screening method and to review the need for manpower training plans beyond those of the federal government.

NUS offers to mediate in Chevron dispute

OTTAWA [CUP]—The leaders of Canada's national student organization have offered to mediate the dispute between the University of Waterloo students' union and the staff of the student newspaper the union closed two months ago.

The Central Committee of the National Union of Students (NUS), meeting here Nov. 24-28 made the offer Nov. 25 through a telex message to the U of W federation of students and the "Free Chevron" published by Chevron staff since the paper was cut off from council funding Sept. 30.

O'Connor said no response was received from the federation, although the council held its regular meeting Nov. 28—three days after the NUS offer was sent.

Student newspaper representatives at an October meeting passed motions censuring OFS for its refusal to take a stand and calling on NUS to "condemn" the U of W federation or rescind its standing policy supporting the statement of principles of Canadian University Press (CUP), of which the Chevron is a member.

The statement of principles holds that no outside individual or group should interfere with the content or publication of student newspapers.

"Your last chance to address mankind"

Man's mystery defies rational analysis

by Scott Haig & Jennifer Warren

"Must we always career from Apocalyptic despair to superficial self-confidence and optimism?" Or can man choose the middle road of steady faith in life, learn from his mistakes, and resist the temptation to fall into cynicism when things go wrong? These questions formed the underlying theme of last Thursday night's "Last Lecture", delivered by Dr. B. B. Bate, Principal of Queen's Theological College.

Dr. Bate prefaced his remarks by pointing out that although the theme of the Last Lecture Series is "What would you say if it were your last chance to address mankind?", a "Last Lecture" should not attempt to make a definitive or historic last statement to the world, since such attempts inevitably fail, and end up being futile.

So many people use pretentious speech in describing events that even those occurrences which are genuinely historic become trivial under the weight of purple language. There was, for instance, so much speculation about what Neil Armstrong would say as he stepped onto the moon, that when he finally did so the words seemed anticlimactic, said Bate.

Rather, felt Bate, a man who is departing from the world need not say anything; the memory of his presence will serve as a lesson to those who remain. Nevertheless, he said, sometimes a few observations, gleaned from a lifetime of experiences are worth passing on.

Dr. Bate's first observation was that man is a wonder and a mystery, and that one should not suppose that one has "explained" man by subjecting him to some sort of reductive analysis: economic, zoological, psychoanalytic, etc. These rational explanations of man are too cerebral; man is also visceral.

Dr. Bate also pointed out that one should not suppose that such rational explanations are entirely objective, since one's prejudices and fears always colour one's thinking, and there is really no objective thought. Instead of supposing that we are objective, he said, we should examine ourselves to become aware of our biases.

A second observation was that man often vacillates between blind optimism in his ability to solve all his problems, and despair over his failures. Bate suggested the reason for this may lie in our demand for dramatic results. We expect overnight solutions to complex problems, for example prison reform, and when setbacks occur, we give up.

The alternative to this vacillation, Dr. Bate suggested, is faith in the meaningfulness of life. Faith includes the courage to deal with reality, to be patient with setbacks, and the willingness to be surprised. Without faith, Bate said, despair seems inevitable. With faith, life remains worthwhile in the face of the most extreme adversity.

Driver given $200 fine

by Patti Ann Trainor

On Thursday, December 2, 1976, Howard J. Lockett of Cananogue was found guilty of leaving the scene of an accident which took place earlier this year in which the truck he was driving hit Queen's student Robert Moffat.

The accident occurred the evening of September 15th when the overflow of people attending a party at 77 Division Street blocked traffic on the street John Hall, a witness to the accident recalled that "A truck pulled up behind the crowd, revving its engine and then slamming on the brakes. The driver, provoked by the obstructing people and flying beer bottles, got out of his vehicle and began to argue with two students. In the meantime the passenger in the truck took the driver's place and parked the truck on the side of the road. The driver then got into his truck and began to rev the engine and proceed to drive down the street in a reckless manner. At this point the truck swerved and hit Robert Moffat."

Lockett pleaded not guilty to leaving the scene of the accident stating that he did not realize that he had struck anyone. He was fined $200.00 for leaving the scene of an accident and his license was suspended for three months.

"We're happy to be third"

"We're happy to be rated third," said Mr. William Miklas, Chairman of the Graduate Program of the School of Business, in response to a recent article in the Financial Times of Canada. In an article, October 25, 1976, the Times ranked the 36 business schools in Canada, placing Queen's in third spot. Western and UBC were ranked first and second respectively.

The ranking was made after interviews with business deans and professors, personnel managers for some of Canada's largest corporations and students.

Criteria for evaluation included size, qualifications of faculty, types of research undertaken, physical facilities, location and reputation of the university as a whole.

The Financial Times called Queen's program "sound" but placed Western "at the top of the heap" as it is "the only school in Canada that can pretend to compete with the larger US business schools."

Miklas felt that the study really places Queen's second to Western since UBC, 3000 miles away serves a basically different labour and student market. He noted that the acceptance criteria of Queen's are basically the same as those of Western.

Mr. Rick Jackson, MBA Liaison, said the article "will make no difference" to students applying to Queen's, since there are more factors in a student's choice of school than are cited in the article.

Prof to lecture on bone disease

On Thursday, Dec. 9, Dr. Leon Sokoloff of New York State University at Stony Brook will deliver the tenth annual Wallace Graham Lecture at Queen's University on the subject of osteo-arthritis. His address, entitled The Biology of Degenerative Joint Disease, will begin at 5:30 p.m. in Etherington Hall Auditorium.

A leading authority on osteo-arthritis, commonly known as wear and tear arthritis, Dr. Sokoloff will concentrate his talk on the cell biology of joints affected by this type of arthritis. New concepts on the management and treatment of joint disease through drugs will also be discussed.

A Professor of Pathology, Dr. Sokoloff has published various works on osteo-arthritis and has an extensive research background in the field.

Sponsored by Queen's Rheumatism Diseases Unit, the Department of Medicine and the office of Continuing Education for Health Sciences, the lectureship honors the late Dr. Wallace Graham who played a prominent role in the establishment of the Canadian Arthritis and Rheumatism Society.

Protect gays through law,

AMS urges

by Tim Greenwood

The AMS Outer Council last Thursday night voted to send a letter to Ronald Basford, Minister of Justice, and other influential Canadians expressing strong support for the inclusion of the clause "sexual orientation" in the Human Rights Act now before Parliament. The motion that was passed directs AMS President Jamie Avis to write the letter stressing that the proposed act has a "glaring weakness" in that it does not provide adequate legal recognition and protection for the gay people that are frequently discriminated against in Canada.

The author of the motion, Bill Burgess, emphasized the need for the addition to the Human Rights Act, pointing out that John Damien, who lost his job as a racing steward, and Doug Wilson, a University of Saskatchewan graduate who lost his teaching position, were two current examples of people being unfairly discriminated because of their homosexuality.

AMS President, Jamie Avis, urged support of the motion suggesting that it did not represent an endorsement of homosexuality but was instead a step toward ending unfair discrimination of all kinds.

Wine, women and song at Vic

by B. Ashdown

Each Sunday evening at 9:00, interested people gather at Galerie Victoria to enjoy a relaxed atmosphere listening to the music provided by talented Queen's students, who perform classical, jazz and folk pieces.

Each month, the French floor of Victoria Hall arranges a French Gala. Victoria French singers from Ottawa and Quebec visit Queen's providing input from another culture. The Christmas Wassail, December 12, is a traditional Galerie Victoria event. Music students provide suggestions for the evening and a special skit is performed by Principal Watts and the Dons at Victoria Hall.

Galerie Victoria is organized by Susan and Gary Berezny and Madelaine L'Italien. They said they had to scrounge for student talent at the beginning but have found enough people interested in participating and the next nine or ten evenings are now filled.

Galerie Victoria is very much enjoyed by all that attend, and the candlelight, hot apple cider and warm atmosphere provide a great way to end the weekend.

Misuse of casuals . . .

Post Office is at fault

by Ross Sutherland

Necessity may demand a postal strike in the next few weeks. If it does it will be what we need. I mean this in all seriousness. A mid-term government thinks that it can get away with anything. This one obviously does. Contract breaking, defiance of court orders, and abhorrent labour practices abound in their most recent dealings with the Canadian Union of Postal Workers (CUPW). If a strike is necessary to protect these workers from an employer backed by state power, the taxpayers' money and particularly favourable labour legislation, then so be it. Simultaneously I sincerely hope there is no strike. But the onus is on a government who has fumbled the ball before!

Technological change is the most talked about issue. But even this is a distortion of a pro-government press. All parties concerned accept the need and desirability of automation. This includes the union. The dispute is over how the automation is to be introduced. This question was at the centre of the postal strike last spring. Then it was solved with a path-breaking contract agreement. The union was given a minor role in the process of innovation. The government had to notify the union with specific information 120 days in advance of any innovation. Within 15 days "constructive and meaningful consultations" had to be held with the union. The exact nature of the innovation, any anticipated harmful effects, and ways of minimizing these were to be discussed. While this is not sufficient it is a start towards allowing the economy to change in a humane and controllable way.

no consultation

The government quickly dropped the notion of consultation. They told the union what it was going to do. Consultations became dictations. These dictations became disastrous consequences. There is the probability that day shift will virtually disappear. People have been forced to move. The new machines are loud and to get to work on them it is necessary to pass a dexterity test. If his test is failed then there is the possibility of being fired. The postal workers' life is being drastically altered. The minimal protection gained in their contract is being implicitly denied by the government.

To bring attention to this deteriorating situation CUPW started a series of rotating strikes. These were stopped after a federal court imposed a status quo agreement. This ordered no more strikes and no more technological change. The government has also ignored this by bringing in more machinery and training new workers.

Since Aug. 1970 the supervisor of this conflict-ridden automation program has been Deputy Postmaster

General John Mackey. From 1961 to 1967 he was Canadian President of ITT. Through its subsidiary, Marsland Engineering of Kitchener, ITT has supplied Canada Post with letter sorting machines costing more than 100 million dollars - coincidence or conflict of interest?

Casual labour is a less publicized but equally serious topic. Article 39 of the contract requires that the post office maintain sufficient regular staff to cover predictable workloads and absences. Today there are nearly 4,000 casual employees in post offices on a regular basis.

The contract also requires that extra work to be done must be "offered first to regular employees". It also stipulates that this will only be subject to the willingness of the employee to accept.

no union protection

Casual labourers cost less. They have no union protection or benefits. They lack experience which accounts for a large number of misprints. The nature of their employment makes it very vulnerable to patronage. And, most importantly, it is a highly unethical source of cheap labour. By the way casual labour is used, the government is actively maintaining structural low-paid underemployment, depriving postal workers of a legal source of income and worsening the postal system.

How could casual labour be misused? The management might let unsorted mail pile up. This cuts down on overtime and holds up mail delivery. Then this pile becomes oppressively large, instead of offering the extra work to the regular employees, they call on the cheaper casual labour. I can't cite any specific instances because the contract requires that any such charges go to grievance procedure. This procedure is surrounded by a legal seal of silence. The grievance procedure is the icing on the strike batter of casual labour and technological imposition.

If a worker breaks his contract he can be fired. If the union goes on strike, breaking the law, they can be quickly punished. If the government breaks the law it goes to a grievance procedure. This is a process of dispute settlement that goes through three stages, ending up in costly adjudication. The government sees fit to push most grievances to this level.

Presently there are 5000-plus grievances under study in Canada. In Kingston there are 57. 20 of these were initiated last Christmas. In general, each case takes a year to come to a conclusion.

A postal strike is undesirable. The government's actions are intolerable. The onus is on the government to straighten up its act. A postal strike, if it happens, is a justifiable necessity.

The future of Confederation and University finance

by Principal R. L. Watts

To most students the two major developments of this past month, the Quebec election on November 15 bringing the Parti Quebecois and Rene Levesque into power and the decision of the Ontario government to fund universities on the assumption of a $100 increase in annual tuition fees, would appear to have no relation whatsoever to each other. Yet, in the next few weeks the role of Quebec in Confederation and the future financing of universities in Canada will become closely intertwined because the first meeting of federal and provincial finance ministers at which the PQ is represented occurs this week and the main topic for negotiation is the revision of the federal-provincial cost-sharing agreements relating to health and post-secondary education. Thus, the financing of Canadian universities and their appropriate future role within the country will be the subject on which the negotiations between the PQ and Ottawa affecting the future shape of Confederation begin.

While the BNA Act assigned jurisdiction over education "in and for each province" to the provinces, it has long been recognized that the research carried out in universities, the provision of educated manpower, and the equality of access for Canadians in different regions are matters of legitimate wider national concern. Consequently, the federal government established such granting agencies as the National Research Council and the Medical Research Council and the Canada Council. In addition, for some time before 1967 it made grants directly to universities.

In 1967 the direct grants ceased and the federal government agreed instead to transfer to the provincial governments, through a combination of tax points and cash grants, 50 percent of the actual expenditure on post-secondary education in the provinces. This means that at the present time the actual source of university funding is approximately 50 percent federal, 35 percent provincial, and 15 percent fees. This agreement was renewed for five years in 1972 and is due to expire in March 1977.

This time around the federal government wishes to make major changes. For one thing, the present agreement imposes on open-ended commitment on the federal government to pay 50 percent of whatever the provinces spend, and the federal government wishes to control its expenditures. Secondly, under the present scheme, there occur repeated arguments over the calculation of costs. Thirdly, under the current system the federal politicians have the unpleasant task of having to raise much of the taxes while the provincial politicians take the credit for spending them.

As for the provinces, Quebec in its desire for autonomy and the wealthier provinces like Alberta and Ontario are pressing for the end of cash transfers and in their place wider provincial taxing powers so that they can be left to manage their own provincial university systems as they please. The smaller and poorer provinces oppose this because it would leave them with inadequate resources to support post-secondary education.

The proposal advanced by the federal government this past summer

Formidable group in PQ Cabinet

by Brian Green

The official investiture of the PQ was highlighted by Rene Levesque's announcement of his Cabinet, and it probably represents the most formidable group ever assembled to head a Canadian government. Virtually all its members boast impressive academic backgrounds, and their collective expertise in business, finance, labour relations, business, and social activism augurs well for Quebec's future. Most governments are plagued with a dearth of members of Cabinet calibre (i.e., the federal Liberals). Levesque, on the other hand, was faced with the pleasant irony of a surfeit of Cabinet material; and his was the enviable chore of selecting from too many qualified candidates. Now, his toughest task will be to appease those backbenchers who—in any other legislature—would have been automatic nominees for Cabinet posts.

But its unprecedented distinction is not in itself—the most fascinating aspect of the PQ front-bench. There is, too, Mr. Levesque's refreshing expression of flexibility. He soberly admonished his Cabinet that its make-up is hardly fixed: disappointing performances, complacency, or too much independence will be rewarded with swift demotion. One hopes that this might help diminish the sense of alienation and chafing discontent that normally pervades the back-benches, that along with the less restricted flow of men will be a free flow of ideas between caucus and Cabinet.

One hopes, too, that there will be no room for the sort of misguided, personal loyalty to his Ministers that has been most notable under Mr. Trudeau's leadership—often leads to egregious errors of judgment.

There is a distinctly Conservative cast to the Cabinet

There is, too, a distinctly conservative cast to the Cabinet. These men surely aren't the zealous reformers and woolly-headed idealists we were warned to expect by Mr. Bourassa. Levesque's most extreme campaign promise was to require more secondary processing in the province of extractive resource industries like mining and forestry, and to mandate more ownership by Quebecers of Quebec industry. That's a radical move in view of the sort of "motherhood" issue all the political parties at the federal level have made of economic nationalism.

And many of the more outspoken Pequistes have found themselves left holding relatively minor portfolios. That's quite a victory for the moderate wing of the party, the extremists are kept prudently removed from sensitive posts, yet concomitantly muzzled by the dictum of Cabinet solidarity. Men like Rodrigue Tremblay—former chairman of the Economics Department at University of Montreal, adviser to the ECC and Bank of Canada, Jacques Parizeau—a graduate of the prestigious London School of Economics and chief financial mandarin on two previous Quebec regimes, and Guy Joron—millionaire and member of the Montreal Stock Exchange, are just a few of those who may be relied on to exert a powerful influence of restraint and cautious circumspection in matters of economic policy. Just a brief glance at the pin-striped, patent-leather tone of sartorial understatement, and the immaculately coiled, conservative chic of blow-dried, grey-streaked sideburns is enough to reassure even the bluest Tory.

Mr. Levesque has proposed a two-tiered sort of Cabinet. This is certainly nothing new. The country's most powerful first Ministers—Trudeau, Davis, Lougheed—all maintain a privileged sanctum of trusted friends and advisers, who generally wield a lot more influence than the mandatory political appointees who fill out the Cabinet. But Trudeau's are as often as not administrators parachuted into the civil service or personal aides in the even more powerful PMO—unelected and unaccountable to the public. And in all cases, the distinctions in power at Cabinet level are informal. But Levesque has made the division official, and has even relieved the four members of his so-called priority committee of their routine duties of a conventional portfolio.

more eclectic outlook will broaden government's perspective

The idea has a lot of merit. It should give Cabinet a more eclectic outlook and help to broaden the perspective of the government. Too often, the change can be justifiably levelled at the Parliamentary system that it is anachronistic and too slow-moving in an age of computer reflexes and logarithmic change. Government is accused of furiously reacting to a succession of crises instead of providing real, visionary leadership. And indeed, the very nature of democratic government—which must submit its record for public approval every few years—compels it to operate within absurdly myopic time-frame "finger-in-the-dike" solutions are the rule rather than the exception. That tends to immobilize government and effectively militates against long-range, preventive planning. Hopefully, Levesque's novel scheme will in some small way help overcome that inherent limitation, and by identifying them will enhance the public accountability of the real decision-makers.

Finally, the obvious stature of the PQ Cabinet should be particularly disquieting to Federalists. There is no doubt that such a demonstration of native leadership of this calibre has reinforced Quebecois confidence in the practicality of self-determination.

Panic in the academic trenches

by Trish Crowe

Say your Christmas exam begins at 9 am. At 8 am or whatever, you get up (if you haven't spent the previous night cramming) and get into a hearty breakfast. You're going to be in that arena for three hours straight and you can get pretty hungry in that time. And there's nothing worse than hearing your stomach echo a thundrous rumble throughout the otherwise silent room. You arrive at the arena at 8:45, wearing comfortable clothes, because you invariably seat yourself in the most uncomfortable chair.

The atmosphere is chilling, to say the least. All the necessary 'exam situation' factors are present. The glum-faced proctors. The little test booklets. The white 'examination attendance' cards. At precisely 8:59, the tenor tone of the proctor chants: "You may fill in your attendance slips, fill in your name and subject on the exam booklet, and begin writing."

And with those tradition encrusted words, the mysterious sacrament of the examination begins.

The initial feeling is one of absolute panic. There's no way you are going to be able to logically answer the questions in front of you. When this panic subsides however, you see what a farce the whole situation is. You are going to make up answers to questions you don't really understand, and will be evaluated on the basis of these improvisations.

Once this is realized, the rest comes easy. The name of the game is deception. Put more nicely, exam strategy.

Lecturers and tutors play this game, too. They don't really believe in the examination rites, but can offer no better or easier solution. Therefore, one must play the game or fail.

After a few minutes of furious scribbling, you stop for a moment to ease the cramp. You look around at everyone else, heads down, scratching at their papers as starving hens scratch the earth for worms. And you realize what a waste of time it all is.

Back to the improvisation. Soon, a proctor chants: "You have five minutes to complete your paper". It's almost over. The final benediction: "Stop writing."

As you wander out, you idly wonder how your roommate-classmate-lab partner-lover-friend-brother did. Then you realize that, to a certain degree, for the past three hours, all others in the arena have been your opponents. It's a race for marks, with no prizes for runners-up. In all intellectual journeys, someone's got to pass and someone's got to fail.

Over to the coffee shop for a cup of coffee or to the pub for a beer or two. By 1:30, you're lucky if you can remember the name of the subject in which you were just examined. Much less recall the content of the subject.

So much for learning! But you think you'll pass, and that's all that's important.

The intellectual poker game closes for another term. Let's hope you managed to bluff well. For that's the secret of every card-sharp, and that's all that matters in the end.

Confident or shell-shocked?

Peripheral Visions (of Peace)

by David Gay

I once read an old Tri-color yearbook published in 1972, which was before I came here. The narrative complained that the hectic pace of university life can "get you down" but concluded that "Queen's is so old, it gives you faith." And the brochures and handbooks agree, depicting the permanence in purpose and setting of Canada's oldest, chartered university. The limestone walls would agree.

But from the inside, university flies like a passing shadow. Everyone complains that time passes quickly here, and who knows where it really goes to? It is enough to scare people, especially since many are spending the supposed best years of their lives here.

And so they question their purpose in being here, sometimes losing sight of the reason they came in the first place. Has the medical student learned compassion? Has the philosophy student learned the secrets of the heart? Has the commerce student learned to trade in the currency of minutes and hours? These are not good questions because they separate students into different faculties like butterflies pinned to cardboard. It isn't always helpful to colour students in leather jackets of gold, blue, burgundy and red. Who can tell the difference in darkness, and what good are candles in sunlight?

I am reminded, perhaps by the cold weather, of an Arctic Eskimo who enrolled in my high school in Ottawa when he was sixteen. He stayed six months in our cozy, knotty pine suburbs before returning to his cold, seemingly impoverished north. Was he weak? Was he stupid? No. He simply encountered another society and the people he met and the friends he made were not enough to compensate for the strangeness of that society. I know that this is an extreme example and that our faculties aren't separate cultures, but in an age of specialization it may be growing late.

In "colouring in" makes us different then what is it that unites people at a university? The yearbook offered many cliches to cover this, things like "working together" and "working with people", and then there is love and friendship. Not one of these things is unique to a university. Perhaps the only thing that unites us is at the same time unique to Queen's is our geographical location. Hopefully not, but who knows? What often keeps us apart is stratification. This occurs when a purse-string society tries to force us into some narrow field of social or technological expertise in order to make us feel comfortable with a mitotic civil service or a burgeoning bureaucracy. This splintering puts a strain on whatever links keep us together.

In turn, this is enough to scare people and many respond by making university into a sort of religion. With its gowns and processions it certainly affords all the trappings of a religion. These students build up the utilitarian treasures of university, desperate to leave Queen's with more in their hands, not their minds or spirits, than what they came with. And those who try and fail to make the academic elect are overwhelmed not only by sentiment at graduation but by fear. To use another extreme example, the essence of this way of life is captured by the turbulence and confusion of the Christmas season. December is a time when people go through the pleasure seeking, cash or credit rituals of neon andinsel in the same competitive, kinetic rapture that drives students through a term at university. But it is Hanuka, the celebration of God's preservation and uplifting of his people in an alien environment. It is Christmas, the celebration of the coming of the Herald of true and eternal life. It would be nice if we could cut away our modern cultural illusions and see these things as they are. Similarly, it would be nice if once in a while we could cut away the kinetic rapture from university and see it in a calmer light. To see it not as a place where we can get a piece of paper which immunizes us from fear, but as a true community, a man-made monument to the ability of people to work and care for each other.

I will now bring this to an inevitable conclusion. I used to think that it was crazy to try to find God in the hectic world of commercialized Christmases and computerized universities. Now I know that it is crazy not to. Perhaps if everyone took this search to heart our future would be clearer, our diversity would be a blessing, and a certain peace would come upon this business of life. Then the blue and gold of Autumn and the cold winter starlight and the warm breath of Spring will flow through these limestone walls as quickly as ever and our time here seem but a moment. But that will be alright, here and wherever life leads us.

Craig Pinchen,
Manager, Bitter Grounds.

Dear Editor:

I would like to reply to several points raised by Andrew Page ("Was There a Conspiracy at Bitter Grounds?", Queen's Journal, Tuesday, November 30, 1976) in his review article of the previous performance at Bitter Grounds.

I am not writing in response to the quality of Mr. Page's review, nor to the remarks made concerning the performance.

I am responding to Mr. Page's blatant implication that it is the delicate intention of Bitter Ground to mislead its patrons through false advertising. This is a totally incorrect and unwarranted implication. There was never any attempt to use "cute wording and slick marketing". Nor is he correct in stating that "What was promised, wasn't delivered."

Our posters, ads and What's Happening announcements were explicit as to who was playing. Mr. Page states that "The ads proclaimed Conspiracy, plus an asterisk and some mysterious initials". I would suggest that Mr. Page read more clearly for his next review. The poster clearly indicates the names of the performers and there are no 'mysterious initials'. The words 'does not exist' are spelled out in full.

Perth County is a loose association of musicians centred around four main performers: Cedric Smith, Richard Keelan, Terry Jones and Bob Burchill. These performers usually appear alone (or in pairs) with a variety of back-up musicians. It is very seldom that they can or will get together for a group concert (hence the traditional advertising "DNE"). The exceptions to this individual performance, are few—the Massey Hall Harvestime concert for example.

In closing, I would like to say again that Mr. Page's insinuations regarding the management of Bitter Grounds are unwarranted. In the manner in which his remarks are presented, they constitute nothing more than irresponsible journalism.

Brazil - problems reconsidered by research worker

Dear Editor:

With regard to your feature article "Brazil - problems in a developing nation" (November 19th), I would like to comment on several of the underlying assumptions which are touched upon therein and through this discussion take a look at the other side of "development". (For much of the detail within, I have borrowed heavily from the writings of the Latin American Working Group, Toronto).

First, the article advances the view commonly held by many in the industrialized nations that there are "developed" and "developing" countries ("developing nations are also referred to as 'underdeveloped countries', 'less-developed countries', poor nations, the 'Third World' and in some cases, the 'Fourth World') which are easily distinguished by simply using a 'yardstick' of economic growth and industrial progress. I will not endeavour at this time to elaborate on how these 'unfortunates' of the economic world got the way they are, or how they are maintained in such a state, or how these very terms provide convenient labels which help affluent nations avoid struggling with the deeper questions of human development, human rights, cross-cultural communication and global justice, rather, I will, for a short period of time, make a 'willing suspension of disbelief' and look at the ultimate costs of actualizing such a premise by using Brazil as a case study.

If we proceed to measure Brazil by our economic 'yardstick' then we must consider that - Since 1964, and especially since 1968, most free enterprise economists have deemed Brazil's economic performance an 'economic miracle'. The country, until last year, maintained an economic growth rate of 10 percent annually. Inflation, which is endemic to Brazil, was held to a manageable 15 percent. Domestic production rose by 14 percent in 1972 and 15 percent in 1973. Since 1963 steel production has jumped by 132 percent, cement by 161 percent and automobile production by 248 percent (today there are more VW Beetles produced in Brazil than in Germany). By all the standard indicators of economic success, Brazil had reached the economic 'take-off' point.

Such a "booming economy" attracted fabulous amounts of foreign investments and loans. Foreign investment has become so pronounced that Brazil's economy has been dominated by the foreign transnational corporation. According to a recent report for the U.S. Senate Subcommittee on Multinational Corporations, "private foreign investment plays an important, if not pivotal, role in the Brazilian model of economic growth." The total stock of foreign investment which stood at $3.7 billion at the end of 1967 had risen to $7 billion by 1972. And by most estimates the $7 billion figures is low.

Hence when we look at Brazil, we must find its Sao Paulo Brazilia and Rio de Janeiro since such urban, industrialized, centres are the earmark of progress.

Northeast and Amazon Basin

Yet, if we turn our attention to those other two regions which the article quickly passes over, the Northeast and the Amazon Basin, the other side of Brazil's foreign investment stimulated "economic miracle" becomes evident.

While the overall picture of the economic situation in Brazil seems to portray a thriving healthy country, it is important to delineate this economic growth from "development" or any concept which purports to represent social progress. Under closer scrutiny, it becomes apparent that the success of the Brazilian economy which it is so enamored by the transnational corporations has been accomplished at a tremendous social cost for the average Brazilian.

One product of Brazil's foreign-induced growth has been a growing concentration of income in the hands of the rich. This is a direct result of economic expansion which favours the production of durable consumer items rather than products of basic social need. The top five percent of the population saw their share of the national income increase from 27.4 percent in 1960 to 36.3 percent in 1970. Meanwhile, the poorest 40 percent experienced a decline in their share, from an already low 11.2 percent to 9 percent. The development of an economy geared towards the satisfaction of the needs of only 5 percent of the population was anticipated by the regime's economic architects. Antonio Delfim Neto, one of the three finance ministers since 1964, has remarked "the most important thing is growth, no matter what the sacrifices or disequilibrium."

Even more significant that the unequal distribution of income has been the steady deterioration of real income for the struggling poor. It has been calculated that the real salary of workers has declined by 30-50 percent since the military took power. The New York Times has reported that while in 1965 a worker had to work 87 hours a month to be able to buy sufficient food to maintain his family at a subsistence level, in 1974 he needed to work 176 hours to be able to purchase the same amount of food.

In order to survive it has become necessary for more members of the family to work. Thus families have been disrupted as children leave schools to enter the work force.

The military government's prioritization in favour of foreign capital is reflected in the deterioration of the health of the average Brazilian. The federal government has reduced by 70 percent its grants to the health ministry since 1966. As a result, infant mortality has been on the increase. These problems have become especially acute in depressed regions such as the Northeast. There in 1970, 148 babies of every one thousand died before reaching the age of one. Three years later the comparable figure was 173 per thousand (Canada's = 19/1000). Dr. Nelson Chaves, the head of the Nutrition Institute of the University of Pernambuco, links this trend to the declining living standards. Over fifty percent of all inhabitants of the Northeast die before the age of thirty.

Whereas your feature article suggests that this "economic miracle" is the result of the Brazilian government's policy of "tight control", and that its "lack of virtues" exhibited in its consistent use of torture, its laissez faire attitude to the "death squads", and its systematic elimination of human rights, is attributable to the particular nature of that government, over against any other one which might just happen to exist, I would suggest that the particular form of government including its "lack of virtues" are directly related to the pressures which the economic elite of Brazil and hence the economic elite of northern industrialized countries have consistently placed on the Brazilian government in order to obtain the necessary raw materials to keep their industry going. The face and form of the particular government simply reflects the unabashed violence of the international economic market.

Mining Industry

An excellent situation to consider, within the total scope of a Brazilian case study, is the mining industry. Here we can see the profound influence that foreign investment has had on stimulating one industry into an uncontrolled expansionist policy, regardless of the results. In June 1973 mining accounted for only 82 percent of Brazil's gross domestic product, yet by 1975 there was a projected investment of $20 billion dollars over the next 5 years. The number of foreign mining companies increased from 59 to 120 between 1972 and 1975. Very impressive! But the costs have been and continue to be great.

former president Goulart

Up until 1964 when the Goulart government was overthrown by the military -

Brazil had a restrictive mining code which all but precluded the participation of foreign mining companies in the nation's mineral development. The code, which was introduced in 1934, had two especially important stipulations: 1) subsol rights were classified as being in the public domain; and 2) exploration and mining rights could only be granted to Brazilian nationals.

The military coup in April of 1964 changed all that though. The junta assumed a very pro-foreign investment approach to development and simply discarded the earlier legislation. One immediate beneficiary of this abrupt change of face was Hanna Mining which prior to the coup had been unsuccessfully lobbying to be granted permission to develop a large iron ore deposit it had discovered in the Amazon. Fortune summed up the situation well by remarking that "For Hanna, the revolt that overthrew Goulart last spring arrived like a last minute rescue by the First Cavalry."

When the military government took over, it changed the policy and began to sell mining rights to anyone who would provide capital. Tax concessions of up to 50 percent for 15 years were offered to attract foreign investment. As the mining rights were sold, so was the Brazilian self-sufficiency in mineral products.

Since mining operations need access to the area, the government of Brazil has criss-crossed the jungle with a network of roads, the largest of which is the 3,500 mile Trans-Amazon highway. These roads cut through the homelands of the native people and have met with resistance in many cases. Because the process of placing these tribes on reserves is lengthy, and because the reserves are constantly being whittled down because of new mineral discoveries, faster methods, such as mass murders, gifts of small pox-infected blankets, bombing from aircraft, and presents of poisoned sweets have been used. Government officials are known to have been unsympathetic to the plight of the native peoples which was fully documented as early as the mid 60's by Roman Catholic missionaries. General Bandeira de Mello, former head of FUNAI, the government agency responsible for foreign affairs, confirmed "the Indians cannot be allowed to impede the natural development."

If we look at the history of the Native peoples in Brazil since the arrival of the Europeans, the truth of the above statement cannot help but stun us. "The native population has experienced a steady decline". It is estimated that of 3 or 4 million in the mid-1500's, only 100,000 have survived. Of the 200 Indian nations existing in 1900, 87 have been annihilated. A Brazilian social historian has predicted by the year 1980 not a single Indian will be alive.

Democracy dismantled

There can be no doubt about it but that the majority of the Brazilian people would reject such a policy if they could voice their opinion, since the overthrown Goulart government which supported a restricted mining code was popularly elected. But Brazil's economic growth, constructed on a foundation of social inequalities and designed to impoverish the majority of Brazilians, only maintains itself through the widespread and brutal use of repression. With democracy dismantled, the military resorts to the most heinous barbarities to impose its control. In 1973, Amnesty International documented over 1000 cases of torture, illegal imprisonment and assassination carried out by the regime. International organizations, including the United Nations and the International Association of Democratic Jurists, have condemned these practices, but with little result. In 1974, the world was once again reminded of the brutality of the regime with the publicity of the imprisonment and torture of a Methodist missionary, Fred Morris. Morris had been arbitrarily arrested and tortured as a "suspected leftist". One indication of his radical politics, according to the Brazilians, was his friendship with Archbishop Helder Camara.

These well publicized instances of torture represent only a small number of the actual cases. One Brazilian Archbishop estimates that there are over 12,000 political detainees. But many of those selected for repression by the regime are never even arrested. They become victims of paramilitary "Death Squads" which act with impunity in assassinating opponents of the regime.

Plight of Natives

In addition, the Amazon Basin, which up until the late 1960's was virtually unexplored and now has become the center of most of the above mining activity and also extensive beef-ranching operations, has in recent years been the scene of overt acts of genocide and massive delation. The Native peoples of the Amazon and their homeland are being sacrificed in the name of economic progress.

Since mining operations need access to the area, the government of Brazil has criss-crossed the jungle with a network of roads, the largest of which is the 3,500 mile Trans-Amazon highway. These roads cut through the homelands of the native people and have met with resistance in many cases. Because the process of placing these tribes on reserves is lengthy, and because the reserves are constantly being whittled down because of new mineral discoveries, faster methods, such as mass murders, gifts of small pox-infected blankets, bombing from aircraft, and presents of poisoned sweets have been used. Government officials are known to have been unsympathetic to the plight of the native peoples which was fully documented as early as the mid 60's by Roman Catholic missionaries. General Bandeira de Mello, former head of FUNAI, the government agency responsible for foreign affairs, confirmed "the Indians cannot be allowed to impede the natural development."

If we look at the history of the Native peoples in Brazil since the arrival of the Europeans, the truth of the above statement cannot help but stun us. "The native population has experienced a steady decline". It is estimated that of 3 or 4 million in the mid-1500's, only 100,000 have survived. Of the 200 Indian nations existing in 1900, 87 have been annihilated. A Brazilian social historian has predicted by the year 1980 not a single Indian will be alive.

On the environmental side of the picture, the costs are not yet known. In the Brazilian Mato Grosso between two tributaries of the Amazon, the Italian conglomerate Liquegas is carving out a 14 million acre ranch. Only a few charred trees remain after the jungle is slashed and burned, and the land is seeded in hardy native grasses. As part of an ingenious scheme for eliminating middlemen, Liquegas is building an airstrip in the jungle big enough to take chartered 707's. The company will slaughter on the ranch, package the meat in supermarket cuts with the price stamped in lire, and fly it directly to Italy, letting nature do the chilling at 30,000 feet.

Other large concerns including the Brascan - King Ranch have "developed" similar tracts of land in order to raise beef for export to the industrialized north. The environmental impact that the loss of what is estimated to be about 10 percent of the Amazon forest cover (the Amazon Jungle represented 25 percent of the world's forest cover) which functions to provide fresh oxygen for the atmosphere and to hold vast amounts of water in the ground, will only be determined in years to come.

Canada

With the above "costs" in mind, I cannot but conclude that if we are to press ahead with using our 'yardstick' of economic growth to measure "development" abroad, and in Canada, that we must toughen ourselves as Canadians to be involved, if not directly then implicitly

(through our support of present government policy, private industry and our bank deposits) in systematically underdeveloping, starving, exploiting and oppressing through military dictatorships, our neighbours in the southern cone of the Americas.

This discussion becomes even more frightening, and I wonder if Canadians in general, realize this, when we consider that economic development, regardless of where it takes place, is a "trade-off". If progress, affluence and industrialization are the keywords, then something must be chopped - human rights for all, full employment, environmental health. Do you ever wonder what decision Canadians will make when the Native peoples of the Mackenzie Valley and in Northwestern Ontario continue to demand their human rights be assured and land claims be settled before the interests of Imperial Oil and Reed Paper are allowed to enter - even though the Canadian and Ontario governments have given the "go-ahead"? What methods will the government employ to convince those who stand against economic expansion at the cost of human rights, that they are not acting in the national interest? Will the temperature right here in cozy southern Ontario become "hot" when the Canadian government has problems paying off its foreign debts in 1975? Canada was the largest borrower on the international capital market and hence must sell off Canada's natural resources at an even faster rate? Do you really think that Canadians given the right circumstances of a falling standard of living and a cold "bum", are too "virtuous" to kill an Indian for the Pipeline?

Atwood: a portrait in words of the fifties

The book has been out for almost six months now. Most of the hoopla that accompanies the arrival of a Canadian novel has died down. Several magazines have paid their tribute by featuring the author on the front cover.

Journalists expose her humanity and mention her latest book. They try to make of her a national heroine and retreat from her home somewhat disappointed, their mission a failure. The book is Lady Oracle. The author is Margaret Atwood.

The critics have written of the relevant aspects of the novel. To me, it is a history.

As one who grew up in the sixties, the fifties seem illusive. Regular history textbooks cannot convey what is lacking in my understanding of the decade.

In Lady Oracle, Atwood fills that gap in a profoundly unhistoric manner. Her method is unsentimental and yet conveys in the most precise manner possible an understanding of Canada in the fifties.

Of course, Atwood presents a limited vision, limited wisely to the Canada of her experience.

In the attempt to portray an age, the plot of Atwood's latest novel is overshadowed by the characters—three-dimensional people who linger in the reader's memory as people one has met and known briefly, but intensely.

The Royal Porcupine, the heroine's mother, her Aunt Lou, Fraser Buchanan and Arthur are introduced in the heroine's daydream early in the text of the novel. They are all recognizable variations on the Canadian theme.

The Royal Porcupine, alias Chuck Brewer, is the archetypal Canadian artist, striving to say something meaningful and, equally important, something shocking.

Mother and Aunt Lou are best described in contrast to each other: "In the summers, when I was small and we wandered the grounds of the Canadian National Exhibition, she (Aunt Lou) would hold me by the hand. My mother didn't hold me by the hand, there were her gloves to think of. She held me by the arm or the back of the collar. And she would never take me to the Ex, which she said was not worthwhile. Aunt Lou and I thought it was worthwhile..."

Fraser Buchanan, the demon of literary criticism, had "started a literary magazine called Reject; the idea was that it would print only stuff that'd been rejected by other literary magazines, the more the merrier, plus the rejection slips. He was going to give a prize for the best rejection slip, he said it was an art. But it flopped because nobody wanted to admit they'd been rejected."

And while Buchanan seemed to be taking notes for a history of our times, he was in fact recording incriminating bits of evidence to be used later for blackmail.

Arthur is everybody's favourite idealist and the heroine's husband. A shy young Canadian who left New Brunswick to aid the ban-the-bomb protest in London. After falling in love with, of all things, a Canadiana, Arthur and the heroine settle in Toronto where they enjoy a certain measure of prosperity, carefully masked.

"Arthur still refused to let us have a car; wasteful, he said. I knew he was morally right; he was always morally right. This was admirable, but it was beginning to be a strain."

Compared to these vivid characters, the plot is disappointing. The heroine's distant past is more credible than her present. As Linda Sandler wrote in Saturday Night, Lady Oracle "is an exquisite parody of an obsolete generation."

Atwood has the uncanny gift of bringing to life the most insignificant detail. The heroin, for example, did not simply disguise herself but covered her head with the scarf she had "bought at the Toronto airport, printed with pink Mounted Policemen performing a musical ride against a background of purple Rocky Mountains, made in Japan."

The heroine's faked death fades quickly behind the memory of returning home from Brownies across the ravine. The horrid children, who taunted the heroine for being fat, continually tortured her by leaving her to walk through the ravine by herself. Eventually, the obvious occurred. A "nice-looking man, neither old nor young," exposed himself in the ravine. Our heroine's first sexual experience.

The run-down of the plot would serve only to confuse the reader. Much better that you untangle the plot for yourself.

Lady Oracle would make excellent Christmas reading for those hoping to escape from the academic sphere and laugh, not giggle or smirk, but laugh.

The enduring magic of The Nutcracker Suite

The magical character of the nutcracker will continue its long history of enchantment when the Hartford Ballet performs "The Nutcracker" on December 28 and 29 (time) at the Grand Theatre.

The nutcracker's spell began in the early 1800's with a story called "The Nutcracker and the Mouse King." Its creator, E.T.A. Hoffmann, is renowned as the author of the "Tales of Hoffmann." He wrote fantasies about characters with two or three lives who inhabited haunted castles, mysterious woods or enchanted mountains. "A world of magical apparitions glitters and flares around me," he once said.

Begun as a ballet which was performed entirely by children, "The Nutcracker", like the Hartford Ballet itself, has grown over the past thirteen years to its current status where all major roles and many supporting roles are danced by the resident professional dancers at the Hartford Ballet. The Company itself achieved professional status four years ago and already has established a reputation as one of the leading ballet companies in the U.S.A.

This reputation, in no small part due to the artistic endeavours of Michael Uthoff, Artistic Director of the Company, has been aided by outstanding reviews during this current season and past seasons from Clive Barnes of the New York Times, the Los Angeles Times, The Boston Globe, Dance Magazine, Dance News, and The London Times, to name a few.

In the ballet's first scene, children are gathered around a Christmas tree opening presents.

Little Clara receives a nutcracker shaped like a soldier from her godfather, Dr. Drosselmeyer. It is her favourite gift, but her brother grabs it from her and breaks it.

Later that night Clara steals down to the darkened room to visit her wounded toy. Mice have appeared to gobble up the Christmas goodies but her beloved nutcracker springs to life, and aided by other toys, declares war on the mice. When it looks as though the tide of battle is turning against the nutcracker, Clara flings her slipper at the Mouse King.

To Clara's amazement the nutcracker is transformed into a handsome prince, to express his gratitude for her help in defeating the Mouse King, he takes her on an enchanted journey.

The pair travel through a landscape of snowdrifts and snowflakes where they meet the Snow King and Queen.

Finally they arrive in the Nutcracker's Prince's own kingdom. Here the Sugar Plum Fairy rules. She commands her subjects to tempt Clara with all the treats of a child's Christmas Eve dream. Toys and candy leap to life: Spanish, Arabian and Chinese dancers, ribbon candy, little bonbons, flowers perform in whirlwind succession. As Christmas day dawns, the Nutcracker Prince brings Clara home in his magical sleigh.

Choreographers for the Hartford Ballet production are Enid Lynn and Michael Uthoff.

Tickets may be purchased at Grand Theatre Box Office, call 546-1756.

The White River Bluegrass Band delighted the audience at Bitter Grounds this past weekend. The band's enthusiasm was contagious.

Queen's Drama Guild

Charles Dickens presents a Christmas Carol

by Eric Hughes

As December 25 rolls around yet another time, thoughts turn to celebrations of the birth of Christ. Charles Dickens and his novel, A Christmas Carol, have been associated with this time of year since the book was first published in the middle of the last century.

The story of Scrooge, Bob Cratchit and Tiny Tim will be recreated on the stage of Convocation Hall this month by members of the Queen's Drama Guild. They will be presenting the Canadian premiere of the Tyrone Guthrie Theatre version of the story.

In a series of vignettes (the play runs approximately one and one half hours) is held together by the narration of the character of Charles Dickens himself. The Drama Guild production emphasizes the ensemble work of the company with over 50 people working on the show. As well as acting in the piece (and some actors are performing multiple characterizations), the cast will be making their own costumes.

Director Brenda Anderson finds the script "entertaining for both adults and children. It is a good family show." She has worked in this production for an "integration of sound environment and music, all of which has been composed in the Queen's Electronic Music Studio by David Whitton and Jim Hipkin."

Appearing in the lead role of Scrooge is Drama Department professor Russ Waller. Waller has also designed the set for the production.

Tickets are on sale at the Performing Arts box office and in MacCorry from 11 a.m. until 3 p.m. Admission is $3.00 adult, $2.00 student and $1.00 children for performances at 2.00 p.m. and 8:00 p.m. December 17th and 18th.

First Chronicles play

Edward II is a topical play

by Eric Hughes

It was often said by his contemporaries and it is still being said today that, had he not been killed, Kit Marlowe might well have been the foremost dramatist of his day. The Queen's community will get a chance to experience the force of Marlowe's dramatic talents first-hand this Wednesday night and Thursday night at 8:00 p.m. when the Queen's Drama Department presents his Edward II as part of its Chronicles series.

On a set of platforms on the stage at Convocation Hall, the actors will read from the play. There will be a minimal use of costumes and no props whatsoever in keeping with the nature of the presentation as a "work in progress".

The production is the first half of a special Drama 500 project by fourth-year drama student Mike Saver. He calls the production a "cooperative effort", and this title seems most appropriate. The actors have been rehearsing days and evenings for the past month under Saver's direction, using many different rehearsal techniques to get at the meat of the text.

Why choose this particular play? Says director Saver, "It is amazing to discover a Renaissance play that nobody ever does, that is so close to contemporary themes such as politics, and social themes such as marriage and homosexuality. It is also amazing to see how Marlowe has dealt with his themes in such an open way in Elizabethan England."

Appearing as Edward will be Jamie Agar, Sue Williamson will play his wife, the Queen, Ted Simonett will play Gascon, the man who disrupts their marriage, and Phil Tarrant will be seen as Mortimer. Admission is free, and there will be a silver collection.

To my dear friends Jimmy and Clark, Ms. pas de Tread alias Lois, Terry the drunk, the red-headed, pipe puffer, Shelagh slap-dash, Big Beth and little Judith, the border station raiders (how Golden we were!), to dear Sanders and Bob M., to Chiel Eagle and usive Anthony, and lovely Grant, to slow FUD and last (!) Ron, to cash-conscious Cindy and the better Boucher Bureau and to messy Tam and Chris (this is MY desk) and callous Klaus and all the rest of you yellow journalists, even Eric: have a merry Christmas and a Happy Hanukkah. It's been real working (??) with you all. You may even see me after Xmas. Farewell Dirty Liz.

GW STAFFERS: what are you doing reading this? Too bad the Lictor doesn't have unclassifieds!! Have a good Christmas (I take the liver out of the sock before hanging it up for Santa) and a Happy New Year. We'll see everyone the 14th. Prancer, Dancer, Scooper and Vixen.

To all those people going home (exiling Kingston) for Christmas, I'm a pilot that likes to fly. That means I can take you home not only a lot faster than by any other means, but in many cases it is not much more expensive. Will fly to any airport in U.S., or Canada: 3 passenger Cessna 172, speed 130 M.P.H. Get 2 people together from the same city. Plane rental $25 per hour. Deal is you pay for the plane, my services free of charge. To estimate the fee for your flight, calculate the distance from Kingston to home, divide this distance by 125 m.p.h. and you know how long it takes to go home. Multiply time to go home by $25 and you know how much it costs to go home, for three persons one way. But since I'm not spending Xmas with you, I have to fly back again, requiring the same amount of hours. Therefore double the last amount for total fare for three persons. Now divide this by 3 and the cost for one person one way is arrived at. Miles 125 m.p.h. x 525 x 2 equals cost per person. I seriously interested call Kevin at 544-7599. Also thanks to the people who returned my Aris jacket which had disappeared Nov. 17 in Leonard Cafeteria. I really appreciate it.

Thanks to J. Morris for the great London party and drunk. Even Scoop was smiling. Hope the kneepads lit. Thanks, too, to all who helped produce this paper all term - see you January 11. T.C.

Yeomen fell Gaels 5-4 and 7-4

Gaels impressive: face uphill climb

by Tom Shand

The Queen's Golden Gaels were very impressive in their showing against the top ranked York Yeomen this weekend at Jock Hartly Arena. Unfortunately, their efforts will not be reflected in the league standings as the Gaels came out pointless and now have but one win and one tie in 9 league games. York Yeomen with their 5-4 and 7-4 victories last weekend have 4 wins and a tie in five games including three or four possible points against the Blues.

On Friday night Gaels outshot York 42-34 but had a brief second period lapse and fell 5-4.

Kevin Treacy connected on a bang-bang play from Ned MacIntyre to give Queen's a 1-0 lead, with ten seconds to play in the opening period. Gaels set the style for the weekend with an energetic two man forechecking system combined with determined backchecking when the Yeomen broke through the front pair.

The excellent disciplined positional play, which marked the Gaels play, broke down on occasion in the second period and the Gaels gave up three unanswered goals. Peter Ascherl and Brian Burch both scored from close in and Romano Carlucci, ex-Sault Ste. Marie Greyhound, employed Brian Harrington as a screen and rifled a shot high to Andy Schell's stick side.

John Goodish, another rookie out of the OHA Jr. A, gave York a 4-1 lead early in the third. Gaels comeback drive was sparked by Brian Harrington who bulled a goal past Steve Bosco, ex-Marlie, in the York nets.

Last season's All-Canadian centre and leading scorer in the OUA, Bob Wasson, banked what turned out to be the winning goal off Andy "Turtle" Schell halfway through the final period.

Glenn Furgoch got the Gaels back in the game when he blasted a John MacIntyre pass through a mess of legs including Steve Bosco's. Frank Coffee made it 5-4 with just 4:11 left.

to play with a spectacular breakaway effort Jay Babcock turned and fired the puck to the Gaels' captain who roared in from centre ice and blasted a 20 footer into the corner from the left wing.

York coach Dave Chambers admitted that he was surprised at the Gaels' dismal record in the standings and admitted, "I was worried in that last couple of minutes. Our guys took the win for granted after the second period but Queen's never gave up."

Saturday afternoon's match was virtually a repeat of Friday night's action. Gaels again played well and outshot York again, this time 35-26. York led 3-1 after the first period. Brian Burch scored twice for the Yeomen, once from a sharp angle and later on, a pretty three way passing play. Also scoring were Jim Masin for York and Kevin Treacy for Queen's, both on deflections.

The second frame was even as

Dale Sandles closed the gap on another deflection with Carlucci responding for York.

Although Gaels were outscored 3-2 in the third, the period really belonged to them, at least for its first 19 minutes.

Using Frank Coffee's expert interference, Glenn Furgoch scored on a solo rush. Jay Babcock then tipped in the third, the period really belonged to them, at least for its first 19 minutes.

The tie was broken by York's allstar defenceman Gord Cullen, who broke in a la Furgoch. Gaels had several good chances to even it up again but just missed and the game's only other scores came from York's Ascherl who notched a pair in the final minute of play to make the final score a misleading 7-4.

Credit should be given all Gaels players for two well-played games which proved to be very enjoyable viewing for all those who came to watch.

On the other hand, as Andy Schell pointed out, "York certainly does not look like the top team in the country." York coach Dave Chambers could only say, "I do not understand why this team goes hot and cold." Notes: Terry Angel played strong two way hockey and continued to add up points as he earned four assists. Andy Schell, although giving up twelve goals, played well, especially on Friday. Bosco and Kostek also were very solid in the York nets. Bob Wasson had a severely sprained ankle but scoring slack was picked by line of Burch, Ascherl, and Hawkshaw. Although Hawkshaw was not his usual dominating self, Brian Harrington and, yes, Ned MacIntyre led the Gaels in the hits department. Gaels Joe Pecaric was given a couple of 'stick jobs' and was forced to retaliate with his fists. The referees called few penalties although many more were obviously deserved. Gaels next action is in the Ottawa Tournament on January 8 and 9, with their next league action being here against Ottawa on Tuesday January 11.

Volleyball Gals surprise league

by Jill Calder

The Volleyball Gals have even surprised themselves at the halfway point of their season. They are currently tied in points for second place in the province. As explained in the last report of the team's progress, they are a member of Ontario's elite league (the top six teams in the province) as result of the efforts of last year's experienced team. The goal of this year's young team was to simply stay in this league and not drop down to the OVA, the league which contains all other university teams and some club teams. The battle with Waterloo on Friday was an exciting match. Waterloo took the match but Queen's forced it to four most difficult games. It was a satisfying end to the first half-season.

With a little technique practice to keep sharp, (and a little of the Christmas turkey) the girls should provide us with some more fantastic play and results next term.

Team points to the Half Season for the OWIAA. Western 10, Waterloo 6, Queen's 6, Windsor 4, and York 0.

Sports Skills Instruction

New registration method

Each year the Recreation Office has tried to get you registered in the course of your choice as quickly and efficiently as possible. Because of your continued interest, as shown by the registration numbers (1200 on the 1st day) at September's registration, the Recreation Staff has had to take another look at its registration procedure.

What we propose to do on Monday, January 10th, 1977 between the hours of 7pm and 11pm in the Bews Gym (2nd floor of the Physical Education Centre) can only work if you know and understand what we are trying to accomplish and that is, to get you registered in the course or courses of your choice as quickly as possible.

In order to eliminate some of the problems we have run into in the past, a new policy has been set. PERONS MAY REGISTER FOR THEMSELVES AND ONE OTHER PERSON PROVIDING THEY HAVE THAT PERSON'S CARD.

Upon entering Bews Gym (The door closest to the P.E. offices), you will proceed to one of four (4) lines. NB. You can choose any line as each recorder will be able to look after all the activities you are interested in. At 6:50pm the Registration Staff will arrive and set up their tables, while the FLOATER will hand out the numbered registration forms. If for some reason you do not use a form, please return it to the floater as all forms are needed for accounting purposes. At 7:00pm sharp, people will start moving through the recording lines. The recorder will check you into the activity you want, stamp your form(s) and you will then proceed into the other half of the Bews Gym, where you will pay for your courses at one of our four (4) cashiers. The first part of the procedure should take about ten seconds, the second part will depend on how many courses you and your friend have signed up for, but hopefully the time will be minimal. From here you will proceed out the opposite Bews Gym door from which you entered, so we would ask that you leave nothing behind, because you will not be allowed back through once you have passed the recording desks.

In order to keep this operation running as smoothly as possible, we (the Registration Staff) would ask that you keep the following in mind.

1. Have all forms completely filled out before you arrive at the recorders desk, ie. NAME-ADDRESS-PHONE-SESSION-ACTIVITY-SLOT-FEE-SIGNATURE.

2. Have your student, staff, alumni, spouse card ready to present to the recorders.

3. Have your money or cheque made payable to QUEEN'S UNIVERSITY, ready before you arrive at the cashiers desks. NB. January 10, 1977 should appear on your cheque as well as name address and phone number on the front or back.

4. If you wish to change lines for any reason, we would ask that you make sure that it is the back of the line.

5. If you have any questions, please don't hesitate to ask the FLOATERS in the RECORDING and CASHIER areas.

If you have any comments please feel free to talk to, or leave a note with the Recreation Staff in our office downstairs.

Bews tries racquetball

Darryll McDonald

Racquetball, a game played similar to paddleball, has begun to catch on here at Queen's. Thus some plans have been made to bring the sport along, to test it as such, to see just how strong the interest will be.

Plans are under way for a recreation type racquetball tournament to be run for men during the second term. In the future racquetball may become designated as a BWS sport, but in its initial period it will be administered as more of an introductory sport. The recent acquisition of racquetball equipment by the Recreation-Intramural Equipment Pool has made the task of introducing this sport a great deal easier.

Rules will be posted shortly in the men's locker room so that those who aren't familiar with the sport can learn about it.

During the second term, a recreation orientated tournament will be organized. The important thing to note here, is that the tournament will serve the dual purpose of recreation and competition. The tourney won't be run under the BEWS points system. That is, your faculty won't gain or lose points should you win or default a game. Racquetball will be recreation orientated, the aspect of competition will remain as a personal thing. Win or lose, the rewards gained from participating will undoubtedly be satisfying.

All men wishing to sign up should do so as soon as possible. There will be an unlimited entry list. The deadline will be Jan. 19th at 3:30 p.m. The tournament will start Jan. 24th.

Rugby elects executive as season officially ends

by Ruds

The 1976 Rugby season came to an official close last Wednesday night with the Rugby Club's annual General Meeting. Out-going Captain Kevin Honsberger praised the high quality of rugby played over the last year and commented, that while the Queen's teams had not swept to the championships in the matter of fact fashion of the past, our "disappointing" season meant no deterioration in the quality of Rugby here at Queen's but rather, vast improvements on the part of other OUA schools.

What constitutes a "disappointing" season for the Rugby Club? A combined club record of 22 wins, 5 losses and 3 ties. That's a .783 batting average, for those that keep track. That record includes a 5 game sweep of our American tour last spring, a sweep of the OUA A sevens tournament, and the consolation trophy for the KOPEC international tournament held this summer during the Olympic games.

The A.G.M. was highlighted by the election of new team Captain DAVE LOUCKS and Vice Captain REID DRURY. ROB REYNOLDS was soundly defeated in his bid to be publicity manager and returns to his former post of lackey-in-chief, Queen's Journal.

Colours, the Rugby Club's highest award, was presented to KEVIN HONSBERGER. TIM PRICE was named rookie of the year. It was decided not to name an MVP this year as the singling out of any one player was felt to be in contradiction with the spirit and ideals of the game.

A motion that the incoming captain treat the club to an evening of refreshment was defeated by executive veto. Many thanks to Coach Gavin Reid (who doesn't like to be mentioned in these articles) for an excellent season, and from this reporter in particular for the chance to get into his pants in a nice way, of course.

WIC-LY NEWS

by Carolyn Corrigan

Well girls, the results are now out. Thanks to everyone who has participated this term, be sure to sign up for the new activities next term. Remember we are having all sign ups during the first week back!

The winner of the Jogathon this term is Johanna Flyssen of Arts' 78 with 396 laps. Congratulations Johanna! The second and third place winners were Daphne Snelgrove (254 laps) for commerce and Katie Brooke for Arts 78 with 173 laps. The overall winner of accumulated unit points was P.H.E. 78 with 1056 laps and following close behind Rehab with 1006. Once again thanks for coming out - we'll be looking for you again next term.

The Inner tube water polo season has ended for the term with that well known faculty of P.H.E. as champions. A whole new season begins in January - let's get together and see if it isn't possible to beat P.H.E. - remember participation will get you points.

Bowling is over as well. Although participation for this sport was small, everyone who came out enjoyed it. Our happy placers (1st, 2nd, 3rd) were Cathy Herrington, Alida Becker, Cheryl Cannish.

Skatathon ended this term with Karen Kinsella, Debbie Woods and Anne Marie Lane holding the top positions. Keep an eye open for more next term!

Remember that January starts a whole new exciting and fun filled season and all sign ups will take place the first week back. So watch for WIC WEEK!

The big snowshoe countdown has started - only 39 days to go so keep those eyes and ears open. Any questions at all? call 549-2976 or 547-5939

RACISM on Montreal Alouettes?

CAC'S CORNER

Star backs Jimmy Edwards and Lewis Cook packing as well

Regarding the allegations of racism, an Alouette fan could also ask why stars Moses Denson and John Harvey were allowed to depart the Als and go to the States after their Grey Cup winning seasons. Indeed, it was only four years ago that number one quarterback Sonny Wade kicked Toronto's Ed Harrington in the helmet during a frustrating game-losing play, and then uttered slurs at Harrington concerning his race. Finally, Rodgers himself, perhaps the greatest athlete the Alouettes ever had, seems destined to head to San Diego, rather than play for those same Als.

This week owner Sam Berger announced he is turning over the control of his ball club to his two sons, David and Bob, both of whom are already experienced members of the Alouette organization. Both these new owners are going to have to deal with black All-Star Andy Hopkins' attitude about the Alouettes' management. It seems Hopkins is also dissatisfied with the handling of his contract by the Als' executive, he agrees with Rodgers' allegations of racism.

If the Montreal Alouettes are to return to championship form then both dissension amongst team mates and the attitudes held by management towards blacks must be examined - and if necessary, corrected.

by Chris Chenoweth

Allegations were made in the Montreal Gazette two weeks ago by ordinary superstar Johnny Rodgers that racist attitudes exist within the Montreal Alouettes' organization. These explosive comments of racism to the press, have only been directed at General Manager Bob Geary, so far. Rodgers stated "Jimmy Jones was traded because he is a black, and C. M. Bob Geary was primarily responsible. They didn't like me and him being together, so it was either Jones or me. They couldn't get me, so they traded Jones." Not only did Geary let Grey Cup Champion Jimmy Jones go to Hamilton, but he sent All-

Northmen overpower B-ball Gaels

by Tom Shand

In an exhibition basketball game here on Saturday night the New York Northmen overpowered the Queen's Golden Gaels by a score of 84 to 65.

The Northmen were in control of the game all the way as they led 41 to 27 at the half. Although it is not surprising that the Gaels were beaten, by the Northmen who consist of graduates from University and Colleges from Upper New York State, nevertheless one would have hoped for a better performance from the Gaels. For example, a shooting percentage of 37.5 percent from the floor was disappointing.

Gaels leading scorers were Derek Swinnard (14) and Kim Carlton (9) while Dave Dempster led the team in rebounds with 6. Although these players should be recommended for their performances, it is obvious that the Gaels will need higher totals if they hope to improve their position in the standings.

The Gaels problems will be compounded next term by the absence of Derek Swinnard, who is graduating at the end of this term. Swinnard is not only an All-Star on a team that is badly in need of experienced talent, but he is also the team's captain.

Hope for the future lies in the hands of the teams' youth, such as Dave Dempster, Steve Simmons, and Mike Henniken. As they gain experience, and coach Pete Smith's enthusiasm towards basketball attracts more young talent to Queen's and its basketball program through much needed recruiting, then hopefully basketball will become a major sport here as it so rightfully deserves to be.

Foreign Secretary Anthony Crosland of Britain has said Britain is ready to play a direct role in a transitional government in Rhodesia. He also stated that the main objective of Ivor Richard, chairman of the Geneva conference is an early agreement on interim government.

In Geneva, the black and white leaders remained sharply split on how to set up an interim government at a three hour meeting. However, Rhodesian Foreign Minister Pieter van der Byl reiterated his government's position that the conference

Dioxin studies

The Ontario Environment Ministry is planning to test dioxin, named as the world's deadliest chemical, if it can insure the safety of the people testing it. Gerald Rees, manager of pesticide research, said that they would handle dioxin in "the same way as radioactivity is handled", possibly by remote handling in a sealed room by testers outside the room.

Dioxin is made during the production of 2, 4, 5-T, a herbicide, and is part of the final product. Both Ontario Hydro and the Department of Transport use this herbicide against weeds along roads and rights of way.

Dioxin came to public attention earlier this year when a chemical factory explosion spread four pounds of a form of dioxin into the environment of Seveso, Italy. Possible effects of dioxin include cancer and birth defects.

New State Sec'y

Cyrus Vance, a Wall Street lawyer, has been selected by president-elect Jimmy Carter to be his state secretary. According to Carter and Vance, Vance's role will be low-key, and Kissinger's style of diplomacy will be discarded.

Vance has been involved as the number 2 American negotiator in the Viet Nam peace talks, and also in negotiations in Cyprus and Korea.

Rust warranty

A standard warranty has been devised by the Ontario Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations and the Automobile Dealers Association of Ontario to protect consumers who have their new cars rustproofed. It provides coverage for the first five years or 50,000 miles of the car's life. During this time the car dealer is liable for the full cost of rust repairs to the car. The owner must bring his car in for periodic free checkups to keep the warranty valid.

Automobile dealers will be responsible for any rustproofing services they offer, but only if they make a commission on these services. Independent rustproofers will not have to offer the warranty.

Postal dispute

Postal union leaders met Friday to map out strategy in their fight with the post office over technological change. Union president Joe Davidson did not rule out the possibility of rotating strikes being resumed.

The complaint is that the government has repeatedly violated its contractual commitment to consult the union fully before introducing technological changes. Postmaster-General Jean-Jacques Blais said he is willing to meet with union leaders, but is not prepared to renegotiate the contract.

Fraud charges

Two top officials in the company which built the Olympic Village appeared in court Tuesday to face charges of fraud, extortion and secret commissions. Joseph Zappia, president of Lew Terraces Zoralega, was charged on six counts, and company secretary Gerald Robinson was charged on three counts. Total money involved was $560,000.

Zappia and Robinson also face charges laid last summer in connection with construction of the Olympic Village.

Thousand Islands

Warren Allmand confirmed previous policy of the Indian and northern affairs ministry when he issued a statement at Ottawa to the effect that expropriation will not be used as a means to expand park space in the 1,000 Islands. The former minister responsible for Parks Canada, Judd Buchanan, had already promised not to expropriate any land for the park unless the St. Lawrence Islands National Parks Advisory Committee recommended such a step. The committee is opposed to expropriation.

This announcement is considered more as a pacifier for public concern than as hard news. It was well timed, preceding a public meeting of this advisory committee at Rockport on December 9. One other statement of Mr. Allmand agreed with this committee's opinion. He said that a

Record wheat crop

Canada had a record wheat crop this year with 864.3 million bushels of wheat, up 40 per cent from last year. The average yield per acre rose to a record 31.4 bushels from 26.8 last year.

Good crops in the United States and the Soviet Union, have depressed international prices, but prices are expected to gradually recover in the new year.

Power brownout

Voltage to most consumers was cut by three per cent on Friday in order to avoid critical power shortages. It was cut for 85 minutes from 11:20 a.m. Hydro spokesman said the reduction was so small that it went unnoticed.

The shortage in power is due to low water flows in the rivers from which power is drawn, breakdowns in the Nanticoke station, and lack of transmission lines from Lennoxville. The subnormal temperatures of the last few days brought on the power shortage by stimulating power consumption for heating.

Car insurance

Car insurance firms are expected to reap millions of dollars in excess profits as a result of a dramatic decline in traffic accidents. The profits will almost certainly exceed Anti-Inflation Board limits.

The size of the rebates will depend on how large the profits turn out to be at the end of December. However, this will not be known until February as many December claims are submitted during early January.

The decline in accidents is attributed to new seatbelt legislation and lower speed limits.

Avis enraged at confrontation with Parrott

"Nothing came of it" was AMS President Jamie Avis' appraisal of the meeting between Dr. Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, and student council presidents on December 10 to discuss the recent $100 Ontario tuition increase.

"People would stand up, be insulting, call him a liar", Avis said. "I was mad...the people at the meeting were extremely rude and childish, to say the least."

Avis arrived at the meeting at Queen's Park in Toronto after the Minister had met with representatives from the community colleges. Avis was told by other student leaders that Dr. Parrott "wasn't interested in talking to them", so the representatives planned simply to read prepared statements.

The questions raised at the meeting "weren't really questions", Avis told the Journal. "Some were phrased in such a way they would enrage me."

Many representatives brought with them petitions protesting the fee hikes. Dr. Parrott reportedly told the group that even if they brought a petition with five million names he wouldn't change his mind on the matter.

"There was no point talking about the tuition fee increase", the AMS president said. "He (Parrott) has heard the arguments about free tuition." Avis described the atmosphere as hostile and said people had a "sneering attitude" towards Parrott.

"I think it did a lot of harm to students", Avis concluded.

The questions raised by Avis at the meeting dealt with university-related matters such as accountability and the lack of university input into government decision-making. The Minister later wrote to Avis asking to meet with him this month in Toronto to discuss university issues and problems.

Prominent British educator, Sir Walter Perry, vice-chancellor of England's The Open University will be at Queen's University as the seventh Brockington Visitor from Monday, February 14 to Friday, February 18, 1977.

During his five-day stay on campus, he will deliver a public address and participate in a series of informal seminar and discussions on the open university concept.

Recognized as one of the world's most innovative experiments in higher education for adults, The Open University is basically a correspondence school. Currently, more than 50,000 part-time students in all parts of Britain study at home from written materials integrated with BBC radio and television broadcasts.

needed by Jan. 28th

The Alumni Association has extended the nominations for the Award for Excellence in Teaching to January 28.

The Award consists of a certificate of merit and a cash award of $1000. The award is given annually to a full-time Queen's teaching staff member who has completed three years of full-time teaching duties. The candidates are judged on knowledge of the subject taught, preparedness, enthusiasm and the ability to interest students in the topic.

To date only one nomination has been received. Nominations must be signed by five students, faculty or alumni and be submitted to the Director of Alumni Affairs, John Deutsch University Centre.

Dunning Trust attracts philosopher, economist & conservative Clark

A social philosopher, a political leader and an economic researcher will evaluate how well Canadian society is responding to the global challenge of dwindling resources and population pressures, during the 1977 Chancellor Dunning Trust lecture series at Queen's University.

The three speakers are Dr. William Irwin Thompson, director of the Lindisfarne Association of Connecticut, the Hon. Joe Clark, Leader of the Opposition and National Progressive Conservative Party, and Dr. Kimon Valaskakis, director of GAMMA, the McGill-Montreal Interuniversity Future Studies Group.

Dr. Thompson will begin the series on Monday, January 17 at 8pm in Dunning Hall Auditorium. He will discuss the future evolution of modern industrial society, suggesting ways of avoiding "doom and gloom".

He is best known for his book, The Edge of History, which speculates on future cultural trends in America, much of which was written while he was in the division of humanities at York University, Toronto, from 1968 until 1973. Before coming to Canada, Dr. Thompson taught at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology at Cambridge. In 1973, he returned to the United States to found the Lindisfarne Association, a community of scholars studying and writing about the future.

The Hon. Joe Clark will deliver the second lecture Thursday, Jan. 20 at 8pm in Grant Hall. His topic is Canadian governmental policy as it relates to the resource crisis.

The youngest man ever to lead a modern national party in Canada, Mr. Clark began his political career as national party in Canada. Mr. Clark began his political career as national president of the Progressive Conservative Student Federation in 1963.

Taking his first job in Ottawa in 1967 as special assistant to Conservative member, Mr. David Fulton, Mr. Clark was so promising that he soon became executive assistant to Mr. Robert Stanfield.

In 1972 Mr. Clark was elected to the House of Commons, on his first try. Less than four years later, he was to be chosen national leader of his party.

The final lecture, on Monday January 24, will be given by Prof. Kimon Valaskakis in Stirling Hall, Theatre D. He will outline Canada's transition from a society essentially concerned with consumerism to a society interested in conservation.

Before participating in GAMMA, Dr. Valaskakis was assistant director of the Centre of Research on Economic Development at the University of Montreal.

GAMMA is largely concerned with enlightened planning for the future, with emphasis on presenting an interdisciplinary view of reality. A report recently published by the GAMMA team of researchers cites what alternatives Canada or any industrial nation might be able to find to the present system of continual growth in consumption. The recommendation is that industrial production and consumption should continue to grow but in a controlled, rational manner.

The Chancellor Dunning Trust was established in 1946 by an anonymous donor as a tribute to the late Hon. Charles A. Dunning, a former chancellor of Queen's.

United Way

As of last Friday the United Way campaign had achieved 76 per cent of its objective. $102,000 are still needed to fulfill the $432,000 aimed at. Canvassing is becoming much more difficult as Christmas draws near. If there is a shortage, twenty-six agencies will suffer, and we will all feel the lack. Claims that too much of the money is spent on administration do not have large grounds. 3.05 percent of the 1976 campaign objective will go to the campaign expense budget, and 7.52 percent will be given to administration. Cheques are still welcome and can be sent to United Way of Kingston and District at 162 Wellington Street.

Local weather

The weather has really been hitting the news lately. The temperature in Kingston on December 2 and 3 was the lowest for 104 years for that date. It dropped to -23 degrees Celsius that night. Record-breaking cold was reported all over the province. Thursday we had 15 inches of heavy snow here, and four transport trailers had to be hauled from the median of Highway 401 at the Joyceville road.

Heavy snowfall this December will push the city's snow budget past the $500,000 mark. Officials are worried that this will mean that the budget will be depleted before January 1. The city is trying to save money by not trucking any of the snow away from the street curbs. Only six sidewalk plows are being used. This is about half the number used in previous years.

Mr. and Mrs. Ode Lam intend to lay a formal complaint with the Human Rights Commission after a city landlord evicted them from their residence on Hickson Avenue last month.

Their landlord charged them with being noisy, having a dog, and changing locks without his consent. But the couple say that the real reason they were evicted is that the landlord discovered that Mr. Lam is Chinese.

Judicial dilemma addressed

The 1977 Corry Lecture will be delivered by Dr. Henry J. Abraham of the University of Virginia, Thursday, Jan. 13, at 3:30 p.m. in Sir John A. Macdonald Hall (Theatre D), Queen's University.

A well-known author and scholar in political science, Dr. Abraham has chosen as the subject of his public address "Judging or Legislating: Reflections on the Judicial Dilemma." Informal discussions and meetings with faculty and students will also be part of Dr. Abraham's five-day stay on campus from Monday, Jan. 10 to Friday, Jan. 14.

Since 1972, Dr. Abraham has been a special professor in the department of government and foreign affairs at the University of Virginia. Previously he taught political science for 23 years at the University of Pennsylvania.

A prolific writer, Dr. Abraham has published six major works since 1956 including: Courts and Judges (1959), The Judiciary (1965) and Justices and Presidents (1974).

Together with Dr. J.A. Corry, a former Queen's principal, Dr. Abraham authored the American edition of Dr. Corry's Democratic Government and Politics, called in the United States, Elements of Democratic Government.

Blizzards and winter world

Winter World '77 got underway on Tuesday evening with Ottawa vs. the Gaels in a hockey match. That evening Arts '80 sponsored a jiving contest in the Queen's pub. Wednesday night's sleigh ride to Wolfe Island (destination - The General Wolfe Tavern) was sponsored by Arts '79.

This afternoon there is a skating party in the arena between 4:30 and 5:20. Arts '78 is sponsoring the movie "A Touch of Class" which will be held Thursday evening in Mac-Corry B-405. Folksingers will entertain and wine, beer and cheese will be available.

The Queen's Ski Club is sponsoring a ski trip to Camp Fortune on Friday. There will be a street dance in Mac-Corry on Friday night sponsored by Science '80 and the Science Formal Committee.

Modelled after the Thundermug race of Frosh Week, a "dogsled" race will take place at 2:00 p.m. on Saturday near Summerhill. Science '79 is sponsoring the race made up of three "dogs" (students) and one driver per team.

The Wanderlust '77 dance on Saturday evening will close off the week of activities.

Feminism: What is to be done?

Women in Revolution" is the theme of a series of activities organized for his weekend at Queen's. The weekend will include films, seminars, speakers and displays.

Susan Stewart, a first year law student and one of the co-ordinators told the Journal the purpose of the weekend was to raise the issue of the role of the feminist movement in the socialist movement. "The liberation of women can only take place in a real sense when the hierarchical structures in society are challenged"

Stewart said. Achievement of feminist objectives such as increasing the number of women in the work force or professional schools, she said, "is basically futile; it really isn't really changed anything."

"Many women are recognising that certain sectors of the feminist movement are effectively using the tools that Marxism provides in order to analyse and come to an understanding of their oppression".

Bicycles poison trees

by Lyse Doucet
Cyclists who chain their bicycles to trees are "poisoning the trees", says Dr. T. Spencer, chairman of the Subcommittee on Grounds.

In observations made by the Subcommittee and Project Green it was noted that, a bicycle chain, when attached to a tree, causes damage to the tree's bark. As a result, water flow is cut off and the tree dies.

This damage, referred to as ringing, aroused concern of the two groups because the replacement of the trees constitutes a large expense and frustrates Project Green's attempts to provide natural landscape. Action is being taken to insure that adequate parking facilities are made available to cyclists. However, with the increase in the use of bicycles and the misuse and the damaged condition of the existing slots and racks, it becomes increasingly difficult for the Physical Plant to maintain the necessary standard.

Dr. Spencer urges students to refrain from using trees as a parking support; should the practise continue, it will become necessary for the University to take "severe action".

Deutsch papers donated

The papers of the late John James Deutsch have been donated to Queen's university by his widow Mrs. Stephanie Deutsch.

The Deutsch papers span more than four decades and chronicle his remarkable career as educator, economist, public servant and writer. Briefs to governments, agencies and commissions of enquiry, special studies, memoranda, reports, newspaper editorials, speeches and correspondence in the collection touch all aspects of Dr. Deutsch's work at both the national and international levels.

In many ways the papers document the major problems of the second half of the 20th century—energy, inflation, monetary policy, multi-national corporations, Northern Canadian development, financing of post-secondary education, federal-provincial relations and Maritime union.

In accepting Mrs. Deutsch's generous contribution, Queen's Principal Ronald L. Watts described the papers as a "most worthwhile addition to the archives," and one of its most unique resources.

The Queen's Journal office is located in the basement of Students' Memorial Union. Telephone 613-547-5540. Subscription rates are $10 for the academic year. For advertising call 613-547-2606.

Succeeds Dean Ready July 1st

Williams named head of education

"Schools of education should be doing more than preparing teachers," said Dr. Thomas Williams of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE) who has recently been named Dean of the Faculty of Education at Queen's.

A school of education should act as a service agency to boards of education and should also be concerned with nursery schools, daycare centres, adult education and postsecondary education, Dr. Williams felt. "We should be more involved in research and there is no reason why we couldn't get involved in university teaching," explained Dr. Williams.

Dr. Williams will succeed Dean

Vernon S. Ready July 1, 1977 for an initial five year period. Dean Ready served for 11 years.

In making the announcement, Principal Ronald L. Watts expressed confidence that Dr. Williams will provide "leadership appropriate to the challenges and opportunities the faculty will face in the future."

A native of Peterborough, Ontario, Dr. Williams studied at McGill University where he earned a BSc., in 1960, a teaching diploma in 1962 and an MA in educational administration in 1965, and a doctorate from the University of Michigan in 1968.

He then spent several years with the department of education at the University of Chicago, his final post as assistant director of the Mid-West Administration Centre. He joined the staff of OISE in 1970 and was named chairman and associate professor in the department of educational administration in 1974.

Before Dean Ready assumes regular teaching duties in the education faculty, he will take a yearlong leave at the Institute of Education at the University of London as a visiting scholar in the department of comparative and international education. He will also visit a number of European countries and the USSR to compare educational systems.

Soberman mediates Laval strike

Since mid-November D.A. Soberman, dean of law at Queen's University, has been wearing two hats. Besides performing his regular academic duties in the faculty of law, he has been commuting between Kingston and Quebec City mediating a faculty strike at Laval University.

In September the professors' union, Syndicat des Professeurs de l'Université Laval, rejected an offer by the university administration and went out on strike, forcing the university to close its doors to some 20,000 students expecting to register for a fall term. The main issues at stake were a larger role for professors in the university's decision-making process and revisions to the salary structure.

The strike was in its eleventh week, when Dean Soberman, a respected member of the Canadian legal profession, was invited by both parties to act as a mediator. In order to negotiate in Quebec City and also fulfil his teaching commitments at Queen's, Dean Soberman travelled back and forth between the two during the last two weeks of November.

However, when the fall term ended in early December, the dean was free to devote, sometimes as much as 16 hours a day, to hammering out an agreement between the disputing parties.

Now back in Kingston, Dean Soberman said that a final draft of the settlement was completed last Sunday and will be presented to the union membership for ratification this week. Describing the proposed agreement as "fair to both sides," the dean said that pressure is building for a settlement before the beginning of the second term in January.

The administration, according to Dean Soberman, is considering scheduling two school terms to run from January through till June in an effort to save the school year for the students. This has been Dean Soberman's first experience as a mediator.

Camp Outlook dance

by Trish Crowe

Friday, January 21 will see Grant Hall rocking for twelve hours straight as Camp Outlook holds its annual marathon fund raising dance in support of its summer program.

The purpose of Camp Outlook is to provide wilderness experiences for adolescents who, for legal or financial reasons, would normally be unable to leave the city. Canoe trips of two and ten-day duration leave regularly during the summer for parks north of Kingston.

The marathon dance, beginning at 8 p.m. on Friday, January 21, promises to be a good evening. The Original Sloth Band, "Highlights", the Queen's Jazz Ensemble, Rockin' Roger and the Ramjets, and Maura McGroarty, a jazz singer, will provide the entertainment. A square dance caller will be present towards the wee hours of the morning, and a live contest will be held to be judged by Joseph Rira.

A digital clock radio will be presented to the person with most money pledged, and a trophy will be awarded to the winners of the live contest. Throughout the night, games and contests will be held with prizes available for the winners.

Admission is only a minimum pledge of 25c per half hour. Pledge cards are available from the Outlook office (2nd floor Union, University Avenue entrance), the Polson Room, from the meal lines and in Mac-Corry, this week and next.

Everyone is welcome to dance the night away (literally). Doors will be open from 8 p.m. to 8 a.m. and it looks like a good time should be had by all.

Adell picked as new Dean of Law

Queen's University Principal Ronald L. Watts has announced the five-year appointment of Dr. Bernard L. Adell as Dean of Law to succeed Dean Daniel A. Soberman, effective Sept 1, 1977.

A native of Edmonton and a distinguished graduate of the University of Alberta (BA, LLB), Dr. Adell, 37, studied at Oxford in 1961-1964 as a Rhodes Scholar and earned the degree of doctor of philosophy.

A member of Queen's faculty of law since 1964, he was associate dean from 1969 to 1971. He specializes in legal philosophy and labor relations law.

Since 1966, he has been a member of the Law Society of Upper Canada and a labor arbitrator. The International Labor Organization, an agency of the United Nations, sent Dr. Adell to Swaziland to advise the government on the development of labor legislation in the first six months of 1976.

Dr. Adell told the Journal he is enthusiastic about the job and notes an "improving character of law students." He said that his main concern will be "maintaining and preserving the excellent reputation the school has acquired and keeping it a congenial place for students and faculty."

On Sept. 1, 1977, Dean Soberman will resume his regular teaching duties. He has been a member of the Queen's law faculty since its beginning in 1957 and dean since December 1968. Principal Watts expressed his sincere appreciation to Dean Soberman for his contribution to the faculty of law and to the University.

WUSC trip:

China study tour

World University Service of Canada (WUSC) is organizing a trip to China for a group of about 18 students and 2 faculty for August of this year. The participants will be selected from Universities across Canada and will examine various aspects of Chinese development. Preliminary research before the trip and a report to be submitted, for publication upon return are required.

The tour will include extensive travel and visits by the research units to educational institutions, main agricultural areas, workers' communes, and historical sites.

The cost of the trip, estimated to be $2500 is to be paid by the participants. Applications are being accepted until 19 January. Further information can be obtained from Dr. McLay in the Arts and Science Office or from Kaspar Pold in the International Center.

In what direction?

Canadian student press grows

CUP (Toronto)—The student press in Canada is growing, but how big or in what direction is as yet unclear.

Canadian University Press (CUP) - a national organization of university and college newspapers, approved in principle, at its 1976 Christmas conference in Vancouver, regional bureaus in each of five areas in the country. Bureaus already exist in Vancouver and Montreal and the expansion plan would establish offices in Ontario and in the Atlantic region and another office in Western Canada.

Summer seminar will study Acadian culture

The annual summer seminar of the World University Service of Canada (WUSC) is to be held this year in Acadia (Francophone Maritimes), in collaboration with the University of Moncton. The program, a travel study seminar on themes of development from economic and cultural points of view, will be organized in research teams. Bilingual arrangements will be made with local residents of the communities visited.

Participants will be selected from universities all across Canada and each will be expected to do some preliminary research, and submit a report upon return. A working ability of French is a requirement for participation. Applications are being accepted until Jan. 19. Information and documents on this four week program are available from Dr. McLay in the Arts and Science office, or from Kaspar Pold in the International Center.

Course offered for staff

by Geoff Gomery

A course on Secretarial Practice offered by Queen's this term will be the sixth and last in a series designed to help Queen's administrative staff upgrade their qualifications and their jobs. The series, and others like it, has been termed a success by Eveline Flint, recently appointed Queen's staff training officer. The courses have been available free of charge to all staff.

By April, seven people will have completed all six courses in the three-year long series, and will qualify for a diploma as a certified Professional Secretary.

The course will deal with the administrative aspects of office management and will help quality office staff for more advanced work. Ms. Flint recognized that the courses might qualify Queen's staff for more lucrative jobs elsewhere, but saw the course as a service to the community, as well as to the staff and the university. In sponsoring staff training she felt Queen's was fulfilling its role as an educational institution. Most of the people taking the courses have been administrators or clerks.

A GOOD HEAD.

Queen's Journal

editorial opinion

For objective news

Thirty-nine years ago the Queen's Journal, the U. of T. Varsity and the McGill Daily founded an organization known as Canadian University Press (CUP). The organization was founded to distribute news of university affairs throughout the member newspapers. Today there are 60 members from Newfoundland to Victoria.

The Queen's Journal now finds itself in the position of being entirely at odds with the acknowledged principles of CUP. The statement of principles for the news service of CUP, adopted last Christmas at the national conference in Montreal, states that the news service should: encourage change in the leadership and - or structure of student organizations "where they fail to recognize their responsibility to mobilize students," to assist in the "mobilization of students against the capitalist economic system where it is found to be preserving the class structure or oppressive to women, native peoples or other minorities," and "assist in the mobilization of students" against the policies of financial cutbacks to post secondary education.

Whereas we agree that these are perhaps noble goals for a political organization, their adoption as the principles of a news service is a discredit to the press. The statement of principles irrefutably implies that the presentation of news from CUP is to be phrased and balanced in such a way that a reader would be motivated to adopt a particular political position. We recognize that objectivity is unattainable the decision as to what constitutes news is an individual decision-but we also believe, to use an analogy, that if one can't be a virgin one needn't necessarily be promiscuous.

We believe that impartiality in news reporting as far as is humanly possible should be the foremost guiding principle for an organization trusted with the responsibility of disseminating news. The present statement of principles of CUP is an insult to the intelligence of Canadian University students and to the integrity of the CUP member paper. It is also disastrous for the credibility of that organization and its news.

The Queen's Journal does not subscribe to the statement of principles mentioned and will continue to strive for a change in CUP. Until our stated principles agree in spirit, the Queen's Journal is a member under protest of the Canadian University Press.

There's reason for leeriness in the Reed deal

by Jim Klein

Ontario Premier Bill Davis expressed disgust with early opponents of the Reed Paper Deal for their inability to tell jack pine from balsam fir. The initial government position seemed to be that the economic advantages alone—development and jobs in Northwestern Ontario—ought to seal the deal.

Opposition Leader Lewis, however, saw the deal as "only a part of a far greater political decision." All Ontarians, he felt, would be touched by the "immense economic, social, and cultural implications" of the transaction.

Round one ended in early November with the government, somewhat chastened, calling for a full independent inquiry before closing the deal. Rights to the 18,000 square miles of timber will not belong to Reed until at least one more year of brief-presenting and politicking has passed.

It is easy enough to see how many concerns might be leery of the Reed proposal. Natives' rights — the preservation of the lands, culture and livelihood of Indians "protected" by Treaty 9 — are just one sore point. The Reed Co. in question, you may remember, is presently charged with mercury pollution at another Northern Ontario operations site. What's more, a government forester in the Dryden management district acknowledged that reforestation objectives are not being even halfway satisfied in Reed timber tracts there.

To be fair, Reed Paper must, after all, remain competitive with other cutters and processors in the province — and reforestation objectives are seldom achieved anywhere in Ontario. Hardwood strips may be cut just a few (lucrative) yards wider than marked trees are removed per acre though they are meant to stand for seeding. The corners cut generate profit to keep us all happy and employed, though perhaps at the expense of future regeneration.

The inevitable argument from industry (and borrowed somewhat from Davis & Co.) goes something like this: "who's going to undertake an industrial operation if not for profit?" ("what's wrong with profit, anyway?") The opposing argument, from native groups and environmentalists is that, while profits are good, so are the lands and waters and forests that benefit native culture, tourists and — if properly managed — a forest industry.

I have, admittedly, been simplistic. I feel simplicity is necessary to the kind of discussion that is, in turn, necessary if our province is to give the best deal, always, to all its citizens and interest groups.

Profitable industries are good — no one would dispute their worth any more than the worth of recreation and culture for individuals. Unfortunately, the world seldom makes everybody happy—if it ever seemed to do so that may have been a matter of the unhappy being silenced by their illiteracy. So, in the Reed deal, we face one of what promises to be many hard decisions about the disposition of our increasingly limited natural resources.

There may be some small irony in the Reed matter. The final legislative decision could place the Ontario Liberals in a third-party squeeze between Minority Government and Opposition. Wedged between corporate and individual concerns, their position would mirror that of the garden-variety 'liberal thinker' (note the small l) who has been accused of appreciating everything right unto its extinction.

To the hopeless ideologue, such questions as the Reed deal are instances of 'the continuing liberal dilemma'. To the poker-player, the stakes are rising, making it time to 'get the kiddies off the street'.

Peripheral Visions  by David Gay

Just another New Year's Eve

Perhaps the most asked question of this infant year is "what did you do on New Year's Eve?" The answers are quite predictable. Most people go to parties to drink and reminisce until it is time to congregate and count off the seconds until midnight, welcoming another bouncing, baby year into the world. I never go out on New Year's Eve. It isn't that I'm anti-social or anything. It's simply that I am not as confident as everyone else about the baby New Year arriving. I sit at home, petrified that some cosmic physician will decide to perform a cosmic therapeutic abortion on 1977 and we will all disappear. He would probably be criticized for it by cosmic churches and the cosmic concerned but so what? It would still be game over for us.

This year was an exception however because I had to drive my taxi that night. I didn't mind, knowing that as the world came to an end I would be gainfully employed without defying the anti-inflation board.

My first passengers of the evening were two ladies on their way to a party on Union Street. I wasn't sure where this was so I patrolled King Street hoping to find it. In time, my passengers grew angry and called me a pervert, accusing me of trying to stall until midnight in order to get a New Year's Kiss. I reminded them that it was only 6:30 but they weren't satisfied and ordered me to drive to Police Headquarters. Both produced German Lugers to back up their demands.

After the interrogation I left police headquarters and found a note pinned to my taxi. It was left by someone who had borrowed the car in a medical emergency. They apologized for the inconvenience and left a theatre ticket as a reward. As I sat in the theatre, I was aware that the note was an old trick designed to make sure I would not be home. I knew that whoever left the note was ransacking my apartment, but this did not stop me from enjoying the play. They would find little to steal in my apartment apart from the staples in my essays. I'm so poor, my belt is made of cardboard and my pants are made of typing paper. I get into places that prohibit blue jeans but usually make my excuses at tobogganing parties. I'm so poor that at Christmas dinner, I make a wish after I break the popsicle stick. My only hope was that they might steal pictures of old girlfriends (framed in real silver in case of burglary).

My next passenger was a drunken engineering student who asked me to drive him home. He also asked if he could store a pizza and a case of beer in my taxi. He neglected to mention that the pizza and case of beer were currently in his stomach.

This was a discouraging way to welcome the New Year, but remembering the summer I tried to snowshoe the Atlantic I realized things could be worse. And so I wish you all a despair free New Year. By the way, if anyone knows how to wash and iron typewriter paper, please write c-o the Journal.

Wanderlust 7:
open sales to all

Dear Editor:

An annual event at Queen's has once again been hindered! I refer to Wanderlust VII, a semi-formal after Christmas. It is my understanding that this is to be the "grande-finale" of Winter World '77 (formerly Snowball), a week of fun and festivities in January. Because the success of the week is dependant upon the participation of the entire Queen's community something should be done about the limiting of tickets for the semi to residence students only. Give off campus students a chance to help the week to be successful too!

Is Canada Really just the 51st state?

"Canada is just another U.S.A." Such was the "stuff" of my Christmas ten rounder with our friendly neighbourhood spokesman for the fifty-first state. To him, a simple visit to MacDonalds, Sears, or his local G.M. dealer was convincing evidence for his conclusion. Superficially the man was right—Canada does look like the U.S.A.; digging deeper, however, a significant difference appears.

America's most cherished sentiment is freedom—freedom of enterprise that is. In Canada we have free enterprise too, but not without tempering it with a social qualification: that a certain minimum standard of living will be available to all even if this condition costs the wealthy through the nose. Although Canada has Medicare, Legal Aid Plans, Unemployment Insurance, Welfare, Canada Pension and Workmen's Compensation, these services are not the difference between our country and the USA but rather result from the difference.

The actual difference between Canada and the USA lies in our political structure. Our neighbour to the south has two real political parties, the Republicans and the Democrats, bearing a rough similarity to Canada's Conservatives and Liberals respectively. Like the Conservatives and Liberals, the Republicans and Democrats belong to the same team—only the sweaters are different.

The founding principles of these parties are identical—both stand for free enterprise democracy. This gives rise to the irony of American Democracy which enshrines freedom of choice as a fundamental right and then offers no choice. You can have free enterprise democracy, or alternatively you can have free enterprise democracy.

In Canada, like Australia, New Zealand and England we have a viable political alternative. The NDP exists to counterbalance the impact of the free enterprise faction. Although our socialist party has never "run the show" federally, it has been able to influence minority governments. The balance of power situation where the Liberals vote yes, the Conservatives nay with the third party making the difference has generated federal socialist schemes in Canada, such as Medicare. Provincial socialism has had a more direct effect through elected NDP governments.

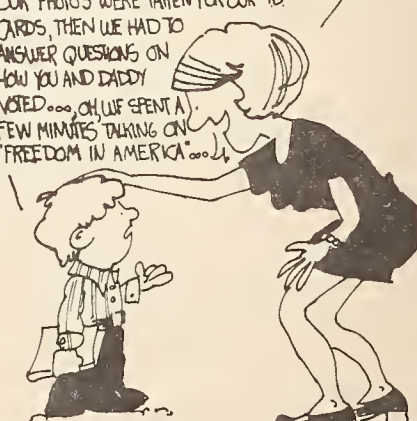

When describing the marrying habits of Westerners, sociologists call our two or three spouses in a lifetime serial polygamy. Canada, unlike the USA, has the potential for political polygamy. As each parliament is relieved by the next, we may jump from a free enterprise government to a socialist one, the new effect of which is a political equilibrium over time meeting diverse national demands. The USA lacks this option, and free enterprise sentiments are leaving their mark on the forgotten poor.

The forgotten poor in turn are leaving their mark on America. That mark to be seen daily, was exposed in NBC's three hour New Year's documentary, "Violence in America." The viewer saw such phenomena as "violence in the family", "violence for posterity". One saw the US murder rate as 100 times that of Canada. The program concluded that violence was not the disease but the symptom.

The underlying malady was never openly stated, but the observation that the vast preponderance of violence in America occurs in poor districts should lead most to arrive at the logical conclusion. Violence in America, in Harlem, Watts and Detroit is the poor man's solution to an impossible problem. Not only is his condition poor but also it is angry, for day by day the medium of television hammers home to the "have nots" what they have not.

Actual violence, violence in the media and a flourishing use of weapons are merely symptoms of America's malaise. Like putting ointment on a Syphilis rash, treating these symptoms only hides the development of the underlying disease. The real problem is poverty and inequality only to be eradicated through a genuine commitment to minimum standards for human life and dignity which is the voice of socialism.

No my friends Canada, the real democracy, is no USA.

NDP is vanguard of Capitalism

by Ross Sutherland

Left-wing groups are often most viciously attacked by the pin-striped pedants in the NDP. Most hated of these is the so called "vanguard" socialist parties—the Trot (trotskyist). To help account for this situation I'd like to look at the NDP's role as the 'vanguard of capitalism'.

Capital in an economic system based on private ownership of the producing sector, has a logic which increasingly reduces personal relations to those between totally isolated individuals apparently freely exchanging on the market. Money and material status symbols become the essence of these relationships. Such atavistic features as traditional kinship groups, extended and even nuclear family units disintegrate. Positions of prestige lose their privilege. More and more people relate as separate individuals gaining social position by their success in the market.

If the logic of these trends of capitalism are carried to their extremes all forms of discrimination must go. Sexism, racism, discrimination based on handicaps and religion are clearly incompatible with full market relations. Historically the CCF-NDP has taken a progressive, if limited lead in these areas. With platforms of equal treatment before the law and protection for all consumers, it has, and does, try to develop the most consistent form of capitalism.

Simultaneously it has been the party most actively engaged in preserving capitalism. It has fought for old-age pensions, safer working conditions, better health care and other social services. Both providing a more humane form of capitalism (still within the essential form, i.e. market relations) and making it more palatable by patching up its most visible misery.

The NDP is also in the forefront of advocating economic planning. This, accompanied by research and risk capital provided by the state and the development of infrastructure by the government allows the development of what there can be of a stable, workable and expanding capitalist economy.

OK, so what's wrong with capitalism if all of these developments can take place? The point is they can not. The more advanced they become, the more precarious the system becomes.

Capitalism is, by definition, a system of private ownership of capital employing wage labour to make a profit. This profit, in turn, must be reinvested if the system is to continue to function. There are numerous ways in which the system will ultimately screw up.

For example, if the economy were to exist without state interference, there would be untold misery, if not a complete revolution. But all state interference costs money. This money has to come from somewhere, either causing inflation, depression, or present bankrupt governments or your choice of combinations. Leading to the same end is the necessity of producing a greater value of goods than is paid out in wages (or else there would be no profit). Obviously, more will be produced than people can afford to buy, causing an economic slow down. Or, maybe the state will buy the surplus putting itself further into debt. All of this ends up in some sort of economic crisis. All of this says nothing about the crime of capitalism which only allows a one-sided stultified personal development.

There are problems inherent to a capitalist system. The NDP and other social-democratic governments are capitalism's vanguard in that they recognize and try to satisfy the needs of capital, hopefully stabilizing the system. Nevertheless, by accepting the market and the private ownership and accumulation of capital, they are doomed to failure. The NDP's equivalents in Britain and Sweden are presently facing some of these difficulties.

This is not to imply that the NDP's demands are useless. In most areas their policies are humane and needed. Even our political dinosaurs are slowly recognizing this, taking away the NDP's political platform and often, its political support. This is done with the certainty that they are not jeopardizing their position as exploiters of other people's labour power. Within the NDP there are radical segments, the proof is the purging of the waffle. But the party's mainstream, as the vanguard of capitalism, has reason to fear any movement for workers control—vanguard or not.

Outward Bound

Wilderness classroom

by Paul Grescoe

Alex Willis had survived. Slightly astonished, secretly delighted with himself, he'd survived the most merciless physical ordeal of his 18 years. He had donned cross-country skis for the first time, strapped on a 40-pound backpack and, with five other men, skied for five days and nights in below-zero weather across 70 miles of mountain terrain in the interior of British Columbia. He kept falling in the snow, his wet socks would freeze to his boots.

One night he was so tired he crawled awhile instead of walking. "Once when we were skiing along, I thought it was a nightmare and I wanted to be woken up out of it," Willis recalls. Later, after he suffered frostbite to one foot, a doctor told him he couldn't go on another three-day expedition into the mountains. Instead of rejoicing, he was wracked with disappointment.

What Alex Willis of North Vancouver underwent was part of a three-week winter course at the Canadian Outward Bound Mountain School near Keremeos, B.C. A second school, the Canadian Outward Bound Wilderness School, operates during the summer and fall in Ontario. Though the winter course sounds temperate, to say the least, if not unnecessarily cruel, it isn't. Willis was the only one of the students on that ski tour who suffered harm, and he admits that it was his own carelessness that led to frostbite.

Alex Willis couldn't complete his course because of frostbite, yet he did absorb the essence of the Outward Bound experience: preparing yourself for hardship, testing yourself under controlled conditions, and allowing yourself to trust others—with your life, if necessary. Boys and girls 16½ and older and men and women into their 50's and 60's have been learning that philosophy in 32 Outward Bound schools in 16 countries since the first school opened on the west coast of Wales in 1941.

The first school, initially financed with about $32,000 in donations and $30,000 tuition fees, consisted of an old log cabin and some tents on an arid ranchland amid the Cascade mountains about 40 miles south of Penticton. The first school director was John Hasell, a rangy young British Army major who'd served with the tough Gurkha regiment and taught at the Royal Military Academy at Sandhurst.

While he'd never been an Outward Bound instructor, he was a sailor, a pilot, a scuba diver, and a climber on Himalayan expeditions. Hasell later became Outward Bound's Canadian executive director. He retired in 1976. As school director, he was succeeded by Geoff Evans and then Adrian Todd, both Englishmen who began to adapt the school to Canadian conditions.

The Canadian schools, Todd says, are looser, less military than the British ones, offering longer wilderness encounters, which require more reliance on the abilities of individual instructors. But the major difference is that the British schools have a high enrollment of management apprentices sent by companies as a mandatory part of their training. In Canada, as in the United States, students enroll voluntarily and, as Adrian Todd says, "Anyone who sends himself or herself to Outward Bound has an adventurous streak."

The advantage of company sponsorship is that the expense of the course is subsidized. The cost in Canada can be high, though not exorbitant, considering that it includes food, lodging, and all equipment except rough clothing and mountain walking boots: from $225 for 10-day senior courses to $575 for the standard 26-day summer sessions (plus travelling expenses to and from the schools). But bursaries for the needy are available to pay as much as half the cost of tuition; last year 93 of the 740 students received them.

Sponsors include grant-distributing groups like foundations, private companies, service clubs, and individual donors (who include the parents of three Outward Bound graduates who died in accidents after attending the mountain school). The Canadian Armed Forces sponsors male and female cadets and service agencies finance courses for troubled teen-agers whose problems are kept confidential when they're placed in a group with nine others.

The success of the schools depends on the quality of the instructors. They're not working for the money—$600 a month plus room and board—but for the independence and the outdoor life they enjoy in their jobs. Their competence can be gauged by the astonishing fact that the most serious student injury in the mountain school's history has been a broken ankle. The four men and two women teaching last winter had a reassuring range of qualifications that included engineering and physical-education degrees and experience in teaching high school students and juvenile delinquents.

Unfortunately, Outward Bound seems doomed to suffer from the myth that its courses are too rugged for most men and women. As John Hasell once put it in a letter to a grad, "Isn't it difficult to convey to people the subtleties and complexities of the Outward Bound experience? One either makes it sound too tough, which frightens people off, or one gives the impression of being some peculiar religious sect that provides mystical experiences in the wilderness."

The quasi-religious image may arise from the school's insistence on inspirational readings each morning, which are normally as innocuous as an excerpt from a mountain climber's journal or a few lines on solitude by Khalil Gibran. The truly spiritual side of Outward Bound emerges in the mandatory service day on each course when students might take elderly people for a drive or dig out a nearby resident's house from the mud of a flash flood.

Critics argue that these attempts at serving others are meaningless—and they might be for adults—but a recent follow-up study of teen-aged graduates of the British Outward Bound school that the service days do plant some seeds. Basil Fletcher, a professor emeritus of the University of Leeds and a former professor of education at Dalhousie University, wrote in his study "The schools cannot, for lack of time, do much more than give the students a glimpse of the importance of community service but, even so, the statistics show how often a window has been opened and as a result after leaving a course a student has sought for some opportunity to continue this sort of work. Certainly the inclusion of a little practical work of this kind does more than many uplifting talks."

Professor Fletcher, who studied Britain's Outward Bound skeptically, learned in his survey of 3,000 graduates that 30 percent had later found their way into some youth work. About 65 percent said they had continued to practise one or more of the outdoor skills developed at the schools. And most importantly of all, 70 percent of their adult sponsors reported a measurable rise in the grads' self-confidence.

Though it has an active grads' association with about 250 members, Outward Bound in Canada has never made a similar survey. But its files are thick with letters from former students brimming with thanks. One came from Gordon Hannay, a west-coast fisherman who'd attended the mountain school.

He wrote about the cold, wind-whipped March night he was aboard a sinking gill-netter. As the boat listed and filled with water, he and his partner coolly prepared for the worst. After sending a distress signal, they dressed in their warmest clothing, donned lifejackets and large buoys they'd tied together, and agreed that if they wound up in the water they'd hold on to one another and stay by the boat as long as possible. They sat patiently on the bow, waiting and hoping, and before the boat disappeared, a rescue hovercraft plucked them from the water.

"The experience of sinking a boat was important to me," Gordon Hannay said in his letter. "because I saw how I reacted in a clutch story, for I know for a fact that my Outward Bound experience prepared me for such an event. I have to come back up to the school and walk in the forests and mountains again. It's been a long season at sea."

Excitement is key to company's new appeal

by Eric Hughes

Excitement is one of the most important commodities in any artistic enterprise. Without it, there can be little inspiration. With it, almost anything is possible; and the excitement with which the Toronto Dance Theatre has surrounded their offerings for this season is quite contagious. It is also perfectly understandable when one realized that not only is any modern dance company in Canada a pioneer enterprise; but that the TDT is, this season, combining two schools of dance thought in both its training program and in its repertoire.

Trish Beatty, David Earle and Peter Rendazzo, (co-founders of the company in 1968), are dancers raised on the Martha Graham technique. This is based on "the natural breathing motion, following the body through contractions and releases, inhaling and exhaling". This style, combined with a classical ballet training, has dominated the work of the company up until about a year ago; and has given critics their sharpest thorn with which to scratch the (luckily) not so thin skin of the company. For the most part, their work was being seen as nothing more than a carbon copy of the work of similar companies in the States. Even though they have concentrated on producing a body of work for the company FROM the company, the founder-choreographers' similar backgrounds worked against any sort of violent departure from contemporary trends.

This season, however, Danny Grossman, a dancer raised on the very different ideas of Paul Taylor, (with whom he worked as a lead dancer), and Merce Cunningham, two of the most famous names in the more avant-garde field of modern dance, has joined the company. His dancing and choreography have added the "excitement" that was needed. Their present repertoire contains dances choreographed both by the original group of three and by Grossman as guest artist.

Next week, the company will be in Kingston to perform, demonstrate, and give workshops for the university, the prisons, and area high schools. There will also be a performance on January 20 at 8:30 p.m. at the Grand Theatre. This will be an excellent opportunity to view the different schools of choreography as well as individual choreographic styles. For example, Rendazzo works very strongly with story-content in his dances, while Grossman's work is based more firmly in the abstract, movement being the means and the end. Both deal with the gamut of human relationships, man-woman, man-man, woman-woman - both the sensual and the intellectual.

As well, the second half of the program will contain National Spirit, one of the company's most popular dances - a real crowd pleaser. This dance lets the company spirit, one of the TDT's real assets, shine through. They are young, vibrant and they are exciting; and they will be here next week to perform and to demonstrate an art form that can still have all the excitement of something virtually untouched.

'Sleeper' to perform

On Wednesday, 19 January the Performing Arts Office will present a return concert by the German pianist Franzpeter Goebels in Dunning Hall at 8:30 P.M. The programme will feature music by Mozart, Webern, Messiaen, Stockhausen and Beethoven.

"In the music business Goebels is known as a sleeper said Barry Cole, Director of the Performing Arts Office. "Unfortunately very few people know him. His name is not a household word. But in that close circle of those in the professional music business, his reputation is hard to beat."

The French composer Olivier Messiaen, himself a pianist of international reputation, premiered many of his own two piano pieces with Franzpeter Goebels.

The programme to be performed is designed with a very specific musical focus. Two musical procedures are highlighted - the variation and the fantasy - by examples from different centuries. Webern's Variations are followed by Mozart's Variations: La belle française. Three fantasies comprise the second part of the recital thus demonstrating three different styles. Messiaen's Ile de feu I, Stockhausen's Klavierstück IX and Beethoven's Fantasia Opus 77 will be a stimulating and rewarding conclusion to the recital.

Kingston audiences have heard Franzpeter Goebels in 1972 and 1974. Both concerts were enthusiastically greeted and encores were demanded.

In West Germany Goebels is a highly honoured professor at the Academy of Music in Detmold. He is also the head of the master class for piano at the Robert Schumann Conservatory and head of the studio for modern music there also. He broadcasts regularly for European radio stations and participates in numerous festivals - one of the most recent being the Handel Festival in Göttingen.

Tickets for this special concert are $3.50, $2.50 for students and senior citizens. They are on sale at the Performing Arts Office box office in the John Deutsch University Centre - 547-6194, and also at the Grand Theatre, 218 Princess Street, 546-1756.

Records

33 1/3" - For his audience

by Bob Murphy

With Thirty-Three and 1-3 George Harrison (34 years old next month) takes a calculated step toward commercialism in an effort to regain that section of his audience which fell by the wayside due to the increasingly cheerless and sanctimonious dronings of his past solo albums. While each of his records contains at least some music which deserves a close listen, I suspect that many found the less-brilliant spots too frequent and too dull to endure. Also, there can be no denying that Harrison has alternately criticized and ignored his following in the past, and there is no excuse for that.

Part of the shift toward the "popular" on the new album has undoubtedly been affected by the appointment of Tom Scott as assistant-producer. The effect of his commercial approach can be best acknowledged by a listen to FM radio. Aside from the hit single, "This Song", I've found that any number of the remaining cuts on the album sound greater over the waves. "It's What You Value", and "Woman Can't You Cry For Me", a funk-oriented blues number, are especially accessible and would serve as fine follow-up singles.

"This Song" is Harrison's sprightly comeback to the recent plagiarism suit filed against him, and won, by Bright Tunes publishing. The judge ruled that George "unconsciously stole the melody of 'He's So Fine' (a Bright tune) for 'My Sweet Lord', a single culled from his first solo LP All Things Must Pass. As a result such lines as "this song ain't black or white and as far as I know don't infringe on anyone's copyright", "this tune has nothing Bright about it", and "this song came to me quite unknowingly" find their way into Harrison's reply.

Rambling honky-tonk piano and growling organ runs (supplied by Billy Preston and Richard Tee), along with Tom Scott's accentuating horn riffs make "This Song" one of the liveliest and most enjoyable Harrison tracks in some time. It is encouraging to see that he still possesses some of the wry humour he exuberated as a Beatle.

In this light, Cole Porter's "True Love", and "Pure Smokey", (the second tribute to Smokey Robinson in as many albums), can at least be seen as likeable oddities. Still, George's persistent tendency to preach most pronounced here on "See Yourself" and "Learning How to Love You", serves only to drag the album down.

Thirty-Three and 1-3 is, I believe, a positive step in the right direction for Harrison, if only because it confirms his re-interest in an audience. Though we can't expect George to forgo his religious convictions, it is when he comes out from under his sullen shroud of sanctity and celebrates his faith, rather than selling it, that his music is most convincing and satisfying.

New German Play at Drama Department

The Montreal Theatre Lab in collaboration with the Goethe Institute is presenting Peter Handke's KASPAR. Based on an old German story, the play revolves around Kaspar Hauser who has been brought up away from humanity; when discovered in his early twenties, he can not talk or walk. The play opens up questions of perception with regard to language and to the nature of the stage as artifact.

Peter Handke, an Austrian playwright, has acquired a world reputation for challenging the more traditional methods of interpretation and psychoanalysis. His main interest is concentrated in exploring the ways in which language shapes our thoughts and our ways of acting. Kaspar is being taught to speak. He is the socialized man that is gradually transformed from the natural man by the means of language. As he learns to speak, Kaspar accepts the prejudices and rules enshrined in the language he has been taught. In the end he becomes one of a series of similar indistinguishable figures.

Kaspar is played by Jack Wetherall who is back with the Montreal Theatre Lab after a season at Stratford where he performed in "The Tempest" and "Hamlet". The voice is played by Miguel Fernandez who returns to Montreal Theatre Lab where he was acclaimed earlier this year in "Goya".

The play is directed by Alexander Hausvater, the founder-director of Montreal Theatre Lab.

This workshop production takes place on Tuesday, January 18, 1977, at 7:30 p.m. in the Studio Theatre (room 102), Theological Hall, Queen's Campus. The company invites discussion with the director and actors after the performance. Admission is free.

Ontario Crafts

The public in Kingston will have the opportunity to meet, on an informal basis, three experts in the Ontario Craft World and related areas at the Agnes Etherington Art Centre during the last week in January. The events are planned to coincide with the exhibition "Contemporary Ontario Crafts on display at the Art Centre until January 30 as well as with the annual Arts Festival at the university.

On January 25 there will be a Brown Bag Lunch with Neil Aird, silversmith, at 12:30 p.m. He will discuss his own work and demonstrate the lost wax process of casting. At 7:30 p.m. that evening, the "Craft Explosion in Ontario" will be the subject of an illustrated lecture by Paul Bennett, Executive Director of the Ontario Crafts Council. A reception will follow the talk.

On January 27 another brown bag lunch will take place at 12:30 p.m. The speaker will be Dr. J.F. Hanlan of the Art Conservation program of Queen's. He will speak about the elemental analysis of silver. At both lunches, coffee will be provided.

Some Films to See

In January, the Agnes Etherington Art Gallery will again be sponsoring an interesting series of films that are screened free of admission charged.

On January 18 at 12:30 p.m. and 7:30 p.m., The Time Machine, a fascinating documentary that takes a nostalgic look at the history of photography and at its emergence as an art form will be shown.

January 26 sees the screening of two short films about the art world. The first deals with the life and work of Giacometti and the second with that of Magritte. The showing is at 12:30 p.m.

Also of interest to serious film buffs is a film series starting January 23 at the National Gallery of Canada in Ottawa, entitled The Modernist Aesthetic in Film.

The film series is organized by Peter Morris and continues on Sunday Afternoons at 3:00 p.m. from January to March. Mr. Morris is an Assistant Professor with the Department of Film Studies here at Queen's University. He will introduce each programme before the screening.

The films themselves come from all parts of the globe and are grouped together for showing under such collective headings as "The Constructed Realities", "Beyond Realism" and "Forms and Structures". All films will be shown in their original language.

Positions as Wardens, Dons and Senior Residents

Positions as Dons, Wardens and Senior Residents are available to persons who are interested in helping to create the best possible living environments in the Men's, Women's and Co-educational Residences. Applications for these positions are now being accepted from both single and married senior students and members of staff. Persons appointed to these positions by the residences boards, will be provided with accommodation in the residences.

Dons, Wardens and Senior Residents will be expected to share their interests and the benefits of their experience, to contribute to the intellectual and cultural life of the residences, and to help new students familiarize themselves with the facilities and resources of the campus. In addition to regular dons, the Women's Residences place two dons in a bilingual-bicultural project and would therefore like to have applications from bilingual persons.

Initial enquiries should be directed promptly to the Office of the Dean of Women, Victoria Hall, 547-6921. Applications should be returned to the Office of the Dean of Women, Victoria Hall, by Friday, February 18, 1977, if at all possible, with a closing date for applications of March 1, 1977.

Poured between Geneva, Lausanne and the lush cheese area of Gruyere, Montreux, a small town in French Switzerland ignites annually for the Montreux Jazz Festival. Initiated by entrepreneur Claude Nobs, the festival has grown to be the most prestigious jazz festival in the world. Minor setbacks like the total destruction of the concert hall in 1974 by the wrath of fire have not occluded the infectious attraction of internationally acclaimed musicians to a town which transforms itself from a refugee camp for British aristocrats to a chaotic amalgamation of music and excitement that is the very essence of the word "festival".

Housing a 32 track recording studio and acoustic baffles that would puzzle any conceptual artist, the buzz of wattage and medusa of wires are all a part of the storybook setting on Lac Lemman. Develop a Ferrari friendship by the cool, chlorinated waters of the adjacent pool where the European jet set indulges in long, tall drinks to numb the pain. Or pick up a new Selmer soprano saxophone to audition in the macro-carpeted lobbies of the 'Casino' (concert hall), but be aware that Wayne Shorter or Archie Shepp may be right behind you. At tongue numbing velocities trade licks about the new Japanese import of Coltrane's '66 tour or a bootleg Portuguese copy of Ornette in '71, but be well graced in the subtle linguistics of French, German, Svenska, Japanese, and rap.

Purists had flocked to Montreux again this year like scientists searching for the ultimate solar eclipse and pre-concert murmurs scolded Nobs for presenting such a commercial program. However on the final day before ignition, Claude Nobs dramatically announced that disco hybrids George Benson and Herbie Hancock had been replaced by the esoteric likes of the Cecil Taylor Quintet and Sun Ra's Myth-Science Intergalactic Space Arkestra.

The first night left the jazz fans scrambling for excuses to rationalize the music. The Billy Cobham Quartet launched into a high powered funk set complete with drum synthesizers, exotic-erotic seashore tapes, pseudo-dramatic narration, and the strongest member of the group was volume. Technically, no one outshines Cobham in the solo format but the cluttered, excessive electronic stage circus was to provide a stark contrast to the ageless drum wonder, Art Blakey, the following night. Cobham ended with a mediocre crowd response and the pungent odour of incense (yes incense) permeated and anxious audience as John McLaughlin's Indian group Shakti was about to make it's Montreux debut. Ironically, Cobham and McLaughlin had dazzled audiences in prior years with the original Mahavishnu Orchestra but after the earthy acoustic meal that McLaughlin was about to present the rumours of late night jam session between the old comrades slowly dwindled. Rapid fire dialogue between McLaughlin on exclusively acoustic guitar and L. Shankar's violin conjured up memories of the double necked monster that glinted in his hands in sports arenas across the USA years ago. But McLaughlin, using the Indian motif to launch his

Agnes Etherington

Drawings at Agnes

An exhibition of the drawings of Goodridge Roberts at the Agnes Etherington Art Centre in Kingston, pays homage to the first artist-in-residence at Queen's University.

While the Kingston years were not the best for Goodridge Roberts, the period was especially important for the development of visual arts activity in Kingston. As part of a concentrated effort to "domesticate" art in the City, the Kingston Art Association with the support of Principal Fyfe and the Carnegie Corporation, appointed Roberts as artist-in-residence at the university. He was well received in the community as the records of attendance at his classes and lectures show. Michael Bell points out in his introduction to the catalogue of this exhibition that "Roberts' presence in Kingston had achieved what Queen's University and the Kingston Art Association had set out to do; the role of art in the life of some Kingstonians had enlarged".

Goodridge Roberts was best known for his paintings of landscape, still life and the human figure. Although he was a prolific draughtsman his drawings have gone relatively unnoticed. This exhibition will demonstrate that Roberts' directness of observation resulted in drawings full of integrity and honesty. They pulse with a sense of living with all its absurdities, seriousness and humor.

The fifty drawings in this exhibition were selected from private collections. His drawings as a war artist and those in public collections have not been included in order to bring to public attention works which would otherwise be inaccessible.

Goodridge Roberts 1904-1974: Drawings is the first phase of a long term project of recording his drawings for inclusion in a complete catalogue to be published at a future date.

improvisations appears more at ease than ever before and this rapport with the audience was soon sensed. The intensity of the music drew respect from all and above the drones, a triumphant McLaughlin left the stage embracing fellow musicians. The evening turned downwards as the Crusaders embarked on stage and left this listener literally running for the woods.

Somewhere between the carousels, the blockaded streets, the local street musicians, the showers of confetti, the early morning swims, the 4 a.m. jam sessions, six more days of continuous jazz from dawn to dusk left their imprint.

The audience pleading with fusion group Weather Report to drop the dancing bass line propelled them into what they felt was one of their most innovative sets in years. Joe Zawinul and Wayne Shorter urging each other into uncharted waters and thriving in an environment where they could escape from the commercial cockpit. And then, 56 year old Art Blakey displaying his new Messengers who for well over a decade have treated audiences to hard bop excursions. The style has become synonymous with Art Blakey. With a strong continental contingent present in the crowd, Klaus Doldinger's German 'Passport' knew that this was no time for a let up and weaved the audience into a frenzy with stinging soprano sax over electronic layering that climaxed after 4 a.m.

An evening with avant-garde featured Sun Ra, Cecil Taylor Quintet and the Yosuke Yamashita Trio, the surprise triumph of the festival. The gents from Japan pulled off the most energetic set of the festival which was coloured by a frantic 15 minute solo clarinet adventure and Yamashita inside-outside of the piano like a madman possessed. Cecil Taylor's playing created an exceptionally strong tension, his typically violent phrasings, harsh or most sweet, kept appearing and disappearing subsided by other ideas continuously bubbling from the leader's incredibly rich mind. Taylor, a satanistic Merlin led the collective ensemble through tenor-trumpet union runs augmented by the Ayler-like cries from young tenor man David Ware.

If Thad Jones could keep quiet about his new record, he offered his impeccable arrangements with his current big band lineup. Monty Alexander, a young pianist from the Oscar Peterson school, charmed the audience in a manner consistent with the gloss of their tuxedos. Stan Getz, a regent of jazz in the fifties, fronted a quartet before an anticipating crowd. With a negative stage presence the evening was saved by some extended virtuosity by the remainder of his quartet, particularly Joanne Brackeen on piano and Clint Houston on bass. The final evening ended on a sentimental note with the nostalgic Sarah Vaughn almost reduced to tears as the festival neared its close. The Preservation Hall Jazz Band with eighty year old Kid Valentine evoked the roots of jazz with haunting memories of New Orleans.

For the jazz freak the game had only begun, for France and primarily Italy host a continual series of jazz festivals throughout the entire summer. But for this brain-bubbled traveller the memories of scorching saxophones and bouncing toes are the nourishment for dreams. Treat softly.

Bitter Grounds

Titcomb at Grounds

by Liz Wood

Brent Titcomb, one of the musicians who helped it all happen in the sixties, will start things off at Bitter Grounds this term on Saturday night. He is one of the "first famous" folk men of that incredible era in Canada and is universally recognized as a very fine musician and songwriter.

Some may be too young to remember the places he showed up at in the sixties, the oldies all know that the respect he commands from big-time acts is for musicianship and not a product of sixties in-crowd whims.

His musical life goes back to the CBC and hoots and informal jams in Vancouver and Toronto. Out of this grew the famous "3's a Crowd" with Trevor Veitch and Donna Warner. I enjoyed their act many times at the Riverboat in Toronto. It was always fresh, funny and great music. Titcomb has shone just as brightly at several Mariposa Folk Festivals while playing with various famous folkies of varying talent. Always he has added things to the music, catalysed an excitement and that was what we sought.

Titcomb has gone on to enjoy an illustrious solo career on the club-coffeehouse circuit and plays such clubs as the Troubadour, the Bitter End, and the Bistro. He's played for Gene McLellan, John Allen Cameron, and Ann Murray extensively and has written many memorable songs. As well, he is a sought-after session man.

In 1974 he teamed up with Tommy Graham whose rock roots make for a fascinating mixture. It should be a good night at Bitter Grounds.

Hockey Gaels edged 5-4 in overtime by Mustangs: defeat TRP 7-3

Golden Gaels in holiday thriller

by Mark S. Bennett

While most Queen's students were revelling in their last minutes of holidays the Golden Gaels Hockey team culminated ten days of intensive conditioning and practice by finishing a very close second in the annual Ottawa University Tournament.

Having defeated Les Patriotes from Trois-Rivieres, the number eighth ranked club in the nation, the Gaels lost a squeaker to Western in the championship encounter. The host club, Ottawa, lost both games they played. As mentioned the Gaels returned early from Christmas holidays, December 29th to be exact, and according to Coach Babcock, have been playing their best hockey of the season. The ten days work paid off as Queen's outskated, outthit and outthought their Quebec opponents in Friday's opening game. Although Trois-Rivieres is nationally ranked the Gaels made them look like a very ordinary hockey club. Babcock insisted it never crossed his mind that the Gaels couldn't win. One reason for the victory was the scoring punch provided by Dale Sandies, Bill Van Camp and Kevin Treacy, three players who will have to play well if Queen's is to catch a playoff spot in the OUA East. It was the aforementioned trio who gave the Gaels the lead after Gary Brown had put Trois-Rivieres in front. Willie Wing and Glenn Furgoch upped the count to five to one before Claude Arvisais managed to beat Andy Schell. That's the way it ended, 5-2 for the Gaels and in the eyes of many the victory was an upset. Friday's second game pitted the Western University Mustangs against the host Gee Gees. The addition of ex-Marlie Jim Kirkpatrick didn't help and the hapless Ottawa club lost by a misleading 5-3 count. Lead by Craig Chandler's two goals the Mustangs were in the final to meet the Gaels, last years tournament champions. In the consolation round on Saturday evening Trois-Rivieres reaffirmed their image of a big rough and tumble hockey team with a 7-3 trouncing of the Gee Gees. A point in favor of the Ottawa team was the fact they managed to play thirty minutes of solid hockey but just ran out of legs in the latter stages of the game.

The championship game started with a flurry and with the help of a goal post or two and some excellent work by Andy Schell the Gaels succeeded in beating back their opening period blues. In fact it was Queen's who got on the scoreboard first as Willie Wing banged home Terry Angel's passout and the Gaels were on their way. Western showed why they have lost but two league contests thus far when they bounced right back scoring a power play goal. With the defense caught out of position Dave Nadeau wasted no time in beating Schell to even the

Although there was no scoring in the second period the Gaels lost the services of Glenn Furgoch who injured a hand. Fergy was taken to hospital but the X-rays showed no fracture.

The third period opened with a bang as Queen's jumped into a quick two goal lead with Treacy and John MacIntyre finishing off two pretty passing plays. Leo Lefebvre made it 3-2 and the match was lit for the exciting barn-burner of a finish. Good end to end rushes highlighted the third period and as the seconds ticked away it seemed that the Gaels would take home the silver wear for a second year in a row. Fate and a lost goalie stick were to put an end to any such luck. Schell lost his lumber and as the Gaels desperately tried to ice the puck Lefebvre somehow managed to get a stick on it and shovel it into the Queen's net. Thirty eight seconds remained to be played. In order to settle the tie Showdown was implemented with each team allowed three penalty shots. Terry Angel had the honour (or misfortune) to go first and beat goalie Rob Moore only to miss the net. Nadeau for Western, Moulton for Queen's and Biron again for the Mustangs scored in quick succession. The Gaels needed a goal from Kevin Treacy but it was not to be as Moore came up with the big save. Thus Western was declared champions, 5-4.

So ended an exciting weekend of hockey in which the Gaels proved to the fans and more importantly to themselves that they are capable of playing much better hockey than was indicated in first term. Friday night the Gaels visit London for what promises to be an exciting rematch before they move on to play York, currently ranked number one in the nation.

Notes: Jay Babcock's high sticking penalty which resulted in both a match penalty and a bench clearing push and shove incident at the close of the championship game has been reviewed by an OUA board which handed him a two game suspension. Andy "Turtle" Schell, Glenn Furgoch and Willie Wing were named to the All-Star team and Turtle acquired more hardware for being named one of the tournament's M.V.P.'s. The MacIntyre brothers, Ned and Jed, provided excellent penalty killing as did Harrington, Angel and Moulton.

WIC answers question "Why?"

by Carolyn Corrigan

Why Wic you ask? Well because its fun, it's exciting, and all of its action-packed activities were made just for you! Yes, of course I realize that we are now into the latter half of the academic year and that many of you are probably thinking that this is a very strange time to be explaining a program. Well, in that, you're correct. I am, however, not introducing WIC but rather re-introducing it.

The birth of this new year has brought with it many exciting events that we think you'll be absolutely thrilled to hear about. Before getting into those events, I'd like to take this time to tell you a little about WIC itself, so relax for a couple of minutes and enjoy.

The Women's Intramural Committee provides low-level competition in many individual, team, and co-ed sports to meet the needs and interests of Queen's women. Wherever you see the symbol of the girl with the ball in her hand and the letters WIC, take a closer look and see what is offered.

Each year, faculties and residences are represented by an "athletic stick" who is elected annually in the Year election. These individuals form the link between their Year and the organization and operation of the intramural programs. The intramural program is designed to cater to the needs and interests of all Queen's women. If you have any complaints or suggestions, you are most cordially invited to bring them to our monthly meetings or to send them to your Athletic Stick. (This can be done by simply placing them in the proper mail-box slot, located just inside the door to the women's locker room.)

The aims of the Women's Intramurals are to provide you with fun and competition. No one need be a gifted athlete. You don't even have to know anything about the specific sport because WIC offers clinics to beginners before most events. Also, the awards system is set-up in such a way as to reward participation. There is a place for everyone, so come out and enjoy yourself. We all need a little of activity - its good for us.

For those who are more competitively minded, WIC has scheduled a separate volleyball and basketball league, so there's no reason not to join. Pennants, plaques and trophies are awarded each year at the WIC banquet to those individuals or teams with the greatest number of points.

You may have noticed a few WIC posters and booths strategically placed in the campus area. Well, located at each of the five booths you will find a lovely young lady, this terms' schedule of events, and the sign-up sheets for those events.

If, by some catastrophe, you should happen to miss the booths (they close today), a final chance will be given to you tonight, Jan. 13th, between the hours of seven and eight in Bartlett gym. This is the last chance to sign for any of this term's events so don't miss it! We'd also like to see you come out and meet your teams, so take a short break and come see the kids you've missed over the holidays. All women welcome! For info call 549-2976. Our booths are located in these 5 areas:

1. The PHE building 11:00-2:00 & 4:30-6:30
2. MacCorry 11:30-1:30
3. Upper Ban Righ 11:30-1:30 & 4:30-6:30
4. Lower Ban Righ 11:30-1:30 & 4:30-6:30
5. West Campus 11:30-1:30

It'll be good to see you back. Happy New Year!

Wrestlers hope to improve

Grapplers to play host

by Alex Faseruk

On Saturday, January 15, the Queen's Wrestling Team will play host to its only home meet of the year. The tournament, the Seventh Annual Queen's Invitational, should prove to be quite an impressive tournament, since many top universities and clubs have already expressed their desire to attend. In all, twelve teams will participate.

The top two teams at the competition should be Guelph and Western. Both of their squads are extremely tough and perennially vie for top honours at the OUA Championships. Queen's ancient rivals, the U of T and RMC will also compete. Some surprises may be provided by the rapidly improving Etobicoke Wrestling Club from Toronto. Rounding out the tournament will be McMaster, York, Laurier and Windsor.

Queen's, with its young squad, can hopefully improve upon its own standing. At the Queen's Invitational, the Golden Grapplers usually have to be content with only two or three wrestlers in the top four. Coach Roy Worthington, however, has a squad which is greatly superior in both calibre and numbers. For a tournament in past years, the Gaels were usually lucky to field six or eight wrestlers. This year 12 to 15 will be representing Queen's at their only home competition of the year. The tournament will be held Saturday morning and evening in Bartlett Gym in the Phys Ed Centre. The Grapplers could only gain from an enthusiastic home crowd.

Last Saturday the Gaels competed in the very difficult Montreal Open Tournament. Roy Worthington managed a second place in the heavyweight class. Roy easily reached the finals by pinning his first three opponents. In his championship match, however, Roy was upset by a wrestler that he had previously defeated at the Ryerson Open. Del DeMonte managed two wins as he fought his way to a fourth place finish in the 180½ lb. weight class. Other Queen's wrestlers all managed at least one win at this very tough tournament. Hopefully they will be able to maintain their momentum and fare well this weekend.

WIC WEEK

Happy New Year! Hope that your holidays went as fantastically well as mine did, and that you are looking forward to the new year with all kinds of new ideas. It's time to get moving on all of those New Year's Resolutions; maybe this will be the year we actually manage to keep some of them. One of mine, (and I hope you're too), is to sign up and participate for even more WIC activities. Let's make '77 the best year ever!

This week, "WIC Week", has been designed especially for all of you keen, fun-loving girls of Queen's. Booths have been set up in the Upper and Lower Ban Righ meal lines, the Mac Corry student street, and just inside the doors of the PHE building. Just trip over to any of these areas and sign up for the exciting activities scheduled for this term. If you aren't able to find the booths, or if you get kidnapped along the way by friends unknown, or if you, by some catastrophe, should happen to forget just track on down to the BEWS gym tonight, Jan. 13, at 7:00. It's your last chance to sign. We'd also like to see people come out to meet their teammates at this time, so take a break and let us see your smiling face.

P.S. Refreshments will be served, so, if you're hungry...

"Super" Bowl: A FARCE

by Chris Chenoweth

Every weekend in the depths of winter, millions of sports fans huddle around their T.V. sets, down tons of ale, and scream their guts out over American N.F.L. football. The most emotional high for a fan is experienced the first weekend in January, when two finalists take to the field in what is billed as the greatest matchup of football - the Super Bowl.

The adjective 'super' has hardly matched the performances of past Super Bowls, and last weekend was no exception. Fans were calling for the football confrontation of the century, and as usual, they were left to watch another dull Sunday afternoon game.

Ever since the "Super Sunday" concept of a championship Bowl game was cooked up in 1967, the actual play of the season's final game has looked more like a soccer match. Only the Green Bay Packers - perhaps the last great dynasty football will ever know - played the championship game like it should be played. But after coach Vince Lombardi's death, these football finales suddenly turned into mere mechanical contests. Rather than viewing the sheer power of talent and athletic skill in championship play, which teams like the Pack exemplified in 1966 and 1967, today the fan is satisfied with breaks that somehow last too long and have too many commercial

In this year's marathon Carr singing "God Bless America" for instance, the biggest highlight was Vicki prepare the public for a thrilling afternoon of casters who are supposed to baseball specialist Curt Gowdy (who should stick to some other than and "Dandy" Don Meredith, who is no stranger to mediocrity on the play-off field himself. Meredith's presence on the tube as a sportscaster is probably the greatest insult to the intelligence of the American football fanatic who must sit through three hours of listening to Don's innuendoes and post-nasal twang.

But let's turn to the game itself. Certainly Oakland is a good football team and deserved to win Sunday, but were the best teams in America even playing in that Bowl game? The New England Patriots were robbed by consistently poor refereeing of a deserved victory against this same Oakland team in quarter-final playoffs. Indeed, New England was the only team to beat Oakland all year during the season, and they should have been allowed to again in that corrupted game.

Secondly, the opponents Oakland actually faced in Pasadena, Calif., the Minnesota Vikings - was a club that is a consistent loser in the big games. The Vikings must be the greatest choke artists since the Detroit Red Wings lost to the Washington Capitals. In four Bowl appearances, the Vikings have never scored a single point in the first half of any game, a feat that is ridiculous in a game that is supposedly of championship calibre. This same team has only managed to score 14 points as their maximum offence for any of those Bowl appearances, which hardly adds to the potential excitement of an already dull affair. Perhaps if fans didn't have to face the Vikings on Super Bowl days, the game itself would be more exciting.

Some good highlights of an otherwise boring afternoon were the play of both Oakland's Fred Bilitneko and the entire Raider defense, as well as the slashing drives of Chuck Foreman of Minnesota. The blocked punt by flashy Viking Fred McNeill is the type of play that N.F.L. could use more of. A tragedy was the play of All-Star Jim Marshall for Minnesota. The 39 year old veteran defensive end has never missed a game in his entire 17 year career, yet on Sunday he failed to record even one tackle on the field. In fact, the entire lamed Minnesota defence was pretty sad.

Saddest of all was the fact that George Blanda, the Raider quarterback-kicker who was the old pro of modern football, did not play for this Oakland team that finally won a Super Bowl. Blanda won many a game for Oakland in years past, and should have received a championship ring yesterday with the team that he carried for so long.

All in all, the Super Bowl Sunday came off as a disappointment for the tenth year in a row. As the immortal Bert Grant summarized in his post game analysis: "The Ottawa Rough Riders could have beaten either team on the field." Right on.

Liberian tankers?

Six of the last seven incidents in the rash of tanker accidents in U.S. coastal waters involved Liberian-registered vessels. However, according to H.P. Drewry (Shipping Consultants) Ltd. of London, the Liberian fleet is practically all U.S. owned.

They stated in a 1976 economic study that 81.6 percent of U.S. owned tanker tonnage is registered in Liberia. If freighter and other bulk carriers are included, the figure is 57.4 percent of foreign registered tonnage.

The reason for high U.S. ownership in the world fleet is that under the pre-1975 tax system, the oil companies could write-off losses of foreign subsidiaries against the company's U.S. taxable income.

The chief cause given by Drewry of the high number of Liberian tanker casualties is that they lack any "effective and responsible control both of the certification of vessels and perhaps more important, of the certification of the personnel responsible for managing the vessel."

However, American sources are quoted as saying that Liberian ships have no worse a safety record than tankers of other countries.

Terrorist caught

French agents arrested Abu Daoud on the weekend, a suspected leader of Palestinian terrorists responsible for the raid on Israeli athletes at the 1972 Olympics in Munich. Abu Daoud was seized in Paris on an international arrest warrant. He is wanted in both Germany and Israel for his activities at the Olympics.

During the Munich Olympics terrorists infiltrated the Israeli compound in the Olympic village, seizing members of the team and holding them hostage. After a siege, the terrorists and hostages headed for the airport. During the fighting, preventing the terrorists' escape, eleven Israelis were killed.

On Monday the arrest of the guerrilla leader became an embarrassment for France as the Arab world condemned it, calling the arrest "an unfriendly act against the Arab world." Meanwhile Israel was preparing a formal extradition request, and asked that Daoud be held until the request was sent. It seemed unlikely that France would honor the request, since that country is trying to maintain its pro-Arab stand in the Middle East. No extradition request appeared forthcoming from Germany.

On Tuesday Abu Daoud had reportedly been released.

Cubans spying

Five Cubans have been ordered out of the country after discovery of a Cuban spy operation in Montreal. Three of them were diplomats. The others were deported for subversive activities detrimental to the security of Canada.

The External Affairs department refuses to give details of violations of diplomatic status, but an immigration official identified the two Cubans without diplomatic status as Hector Araoz and Santo Hernandez-Cuesta.

China unrest

Posters attacking more key Chinese officials in the centre of Peking demonstrated the political conflict now going on in China. Liu Hsiangping, the Minister of Public Health, Wang Hai-jung, Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs and Liu Chuan-hsia, generally believed to be the Police Chief were attacked publicly for alleged radical ties.

An increasing number of slogans praise former vice-premier Teng Hsiao-ping and call for his return to office. Chairman Hua Kuo-feng and other senior Communist Party leaders did not appear in public for the sixth consecutive day, indicating that they have been holding important political meetings.

Most foreign analysts agree that the struggle is not over Hua's position. They disagree over whether Hua is a figurehead who has no power and is now a bystander in the struggle, or whether those elements who put him into power are trying to assert their control over him, seeing that he is beginning to wield significant power on his own.

Unusable vaccine

Canadian authorities have found that one third of the swine-flu vaccine ordered from foreign sources is unusable. The three million doses of monovalent vaccine came from bulk vaccine suppliers in the United Kingdom, France, Australia, Holland, and West Germany.

The vaccine was inspected by federal health officials before being distributed across the country. Negotiations are presently underway to decide who is responsible for paying for the bad vaccine.

The national swine flu program which was begun in November has been partially called off by Health Minister Marc Lalonde. In the U.S., the vaccine has been linked to a temporary paralysis experienced by some recipients of the inoculations.

No to annexation

Reeve Peter Beeman outlined areas for inter-municipal co-operation in his inaugural address this Monday to the township. He stressed that this co-operation depends on the city not considering annexation or amalgamation or any other form of regionalism for the next two years.

Over the past year-and-a-half there have been three annexation proposals. Mention has been made of annexing township land around Division Street and Highway 401 to build a shopping centre, the Norman Rogers airport, which the city already owns, and Kingston Township.

Reeve Beeman also discussed means of improving co-operation between the municipalities of Ernestown and Pittsburgh Township, the city, and the township. Among possible moves is the demolishing of the present buildings of Hotel Dieu Hospital and the building of a new hospital located outside the city in the township or possibly in the Amherstview area. Such a site would better serve the district population, which is shifting beyond the western boundaries of the city. The new buildings could also have a special security wing to care for penitentiary inmates needing treatment.

A new recreation and cultural centre is being proposed, and this may turn into a site for a new fall fair. A regional shopping centre in the township is felt to be a good idea, and Reeve Beeman would like to see a sandy beach created along Front Road, running from the Little Catewaug Creek to the grain elevator. This would be for public use, and would be built in co-operation with the Catewaug Region Conservation Authority and the city.

Housing program

At the inaugural meeting of the township council Reeve Peter Beeman said that over $19 million worth of building permits were given out last year in Kingston Township. Housing units were awarded $13.8 million and industrial, institutional and commercial buildings were given $5.2 million.

Work is almost over on one hundred and fifty town houses in the housing for people program of the township, and this year a 152-unit townhouse development will be begun. Planning board and council may in addition approve a proposal for six hundred apartment units.

Last year the township's water pollution control plant was expanded, and a new water treatment plant was developed into one of the most sophisticated filtration plants in Ontario. This year the Days Road sewage pumpage station will be renovated and expanded.

A bridge on Gardiner's road to cross the CNR tracks is being planned, as well as a Bayridge Drive overpass crossing Highway 33 and the CNR tracks.

A useful recommendation Reeve Beeman put forward was to expand the township's bus service. He named the attraction of industry to a new 400-acre industrial park in the township as top priority.

Submarine cable

The Ontario Hydro has picked the Bay of Quinte as the site of the first high-voltage transmission line to be run under water in Ontario. The 230,000-volt power line will be one mile long and, two years from now, will transport power from the Lennox Generating Station at Bath over to Prince Edward County.

Although the 270 miles of submarine cable in service in Ontario only goes up to 46,000 volts, Ontario Hydro is confident that no danger will result for swimmers, boaters, or boats dropping anchor. Even if the cable was split by an anchor the current would go to ground without harming the ship. No swimmer has ever been electrocuted by a submarine power line in Ontario.

The reason Hydro is having submarine cables installed rather than overhead wires to cross water is the danger of high boat masts touching the overhead wires. Such collisions have resulted in severe injury and death for boaters.

These cables will be covered with steel and wire for protection. Heat generated by them will be carried off by a metal jacket filled with oil.

Odds and ends

A 500-pound lion shoved his furry face between the heads of two ladies who were driving a truck along a California road. He had smashed through the partition dividing the front of the van from the back. Enjoying the front-seat view, he stayed there for nine hours, refusing all attempts to entice him into the back until a physician arrived to shoot a tranquilizer into him. The pet lion's owner was moving him from one home to another.

Ottawa has passed a bylaw prohibiting smoking in all public places, but has forgotten to give the parking control officers, those responsible for enforcing the bylaw, any authority to find out the identity of an offender or to arrest him.

Bus-It price jumps to $109,000

No discount, no contract, Steep tells P.U.C.

by Anne Johnson
The Bus-It program may be scrapped if the PUC decide not to offer some volume discount in price to Queen's for next year.

In a presentation to the Kingston Public Utilities Commission, Paul Steep, AMS Vice President (operations), said "Because there is no saving there is no incentive to enter into a contract. If we are going to have to pay for every ride then we might as well pay on an individual basis."

"The only way the AMS will enter into a Bus-It agreement is if there is a cost saving given to us in light of the fact that we are buying all our fares at once. This is a simple and well accepted principle of business. Anyone who buys in bulk expects to pay less."

At the moment, Queen's students are paying $5.35 of their student fees in order to ride on Kingston's buses by simply showing their student cards. This fee amounts to 60 percent of the cost per person - the other 40 percent is paid by the university. Included in the Bus-It program is the cost of a shuttle bus service run between main and west campus from 11:30pm and 1:00am.

The PUC now calculates the Bus-It fee by multiplying the total number of rides times the individual fare. City bus fares have been raised to 30 cents per ride this year.

Last year the PUC estimated the number of rides students would take at 350,000 for a cost of $87,000. This year, the PUC has upped the fare by five cents and rides to 362,970, for a total cost of $109,891, $22,000 more than last year.

According to Steep, the costs of the program have become too high to accept. He maintains that Queen's students would not use the transport system as much if it were not for the existence of the Bus-It program, and that the PUC gains a substantial benefit from this increased usage.

The possibility of a shuttle service at a cost of approximately $40,000 between the main and west campuses is being considered as a viable alternative to Bus-It.

The University, which was reluctant to commit itself to paying a straight 40 percent of the cost of Bus-It last year, would not increase its present contribution, AMS President Jamie Avis said. Thus the total proposed increase would need to be met by students through an increase in the student levy of approximately $2.80.

Report will ask Queen's to take over Elrond Inc.

Queen's University will be advised to assume title to Elrond College, the Queen's Journal has learned. In a report to be made public next week, a Special Review Committee set up last April will recommend that the most realistic option for the solution of Elrond's long-standing financial plight is the take-over of Elrond Inc. by Queen's.

As a result of litigation in 1975, Queen's has the option of taking over the College as a full University residence at anytime.

At present, Central Mortgage Housing and Loan hold the first mortgage on the building, Queen's the second and the AMS the third. According to one member of the committee, it is felt the University has virtually no choice but to commit itself to a guarantee of Elrond's finances. Bankruptcy on the part of Elrond College would create a sizeable student housing displacement and the University would incur bad publicity. Elrond College being closely associated with Queen's in the public eye.

Elrond's vacancy rate is considered the prime reason behind the College's financial problems. The summer vacancy rate is normally around 40 percent.

The review committee outlined its recommendations to the Elrond College Executive Board last Tuesday evening. An official statement concerning the future of Elrond is expected to be released following the general annual meeting of Elrond College, on February 4th.

In the meantime, Elrond residents are being offered financial incentives of $50 if they are able to find others to move into the College.

Chances for university affected, schools need fair marking system

A research team from Queen's University has found that the variation in standards in Ontario High Schools can affect a student's chances of entering highly competitive university programs such as pharmacy and nursing.

The one-year research project, costing $619,000, was conducted by a Queen's team headed by Dr. Alan King of the Faculty of Education, in cooperation with the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

The researchers found a general increase in the level of marks in Grade 13, as the result of generous marking, rather than of greater academic efforts.

Dr. King argued "the greater the diversity, the more problems there are in determining who should be admitted to what program. The system needs some form of co-operation to ensure that students have an equal opportunity to get into post-secondary institutions."

The research team interviewed members of the general public, teachers and students and found a consensus on the need for a standard curriculum and testing in high schools. It was generally felt that high school students' abilities have declined.

Opposition Leader Stephen Lewis criticized the schools study as a waste of money. He said the money spent "could have been better used to show how to make high school tougher and more relevant."

Thompson's vision for the future

by Barb Boucher

On Monday night in the first of a series of Dunning Trust Lectures, Dr. William Irwin Thompson revealed to a receptive audience his vision of the future. It is his belief that our presently ailing society must be transformed if we are to avoid bedlam ("chaos"). His hope is that people will turn away from the consumer society of the cities and take up an organic contemplative life, small scale, ecologically mixed communities.

At the outset, Dr. Thompson introduced the notion of archetypes to get at the source of difficulty in our cultural consciousness. It is his position that we maintain a self image that corresponds to the animus (male). This is a dominant prototype that leads us to control nature for our own purposes. Dr.

Thompson proposes that Western society integrate the anima (a female archetype) into our consciousness. This effort would achieve a balance and harmony within nature.

At several junctures in the lecture, he made reference to ways of thinking which include the tao (zen), the native mindset, and meditation. All these ideas were brought together in a schematic description of the circle with its relationship between the center and periphery. He extended this notion into the spiral so as to encompass the past and future in an historical perspective. The concept was applied as an outline for social interaction amongst the elite (ego center) and the others (at the periphery).

Dr. Thompson made mention of his hesitation to take up action in defence against large corporate structures like that of G.M. He does not wish to recognize the existence of one force, multinational power and then create a reverse force set antagonistically against it. He proposes that we transcend this. He stated that a key factor was the ability to take the necessary risks. One must create something where a void previously existed. His own option has been to develop the Lindisfarne Community. He supposes that when the crunch does arrive Lindisfarne and its counterparts will be available to set a new trend. If it does not work out then they haven't caused harm to anyone in the process.

Dr. Thompson made it clear that he does not favor the back to the land reversion. He believes that this would be a return to primitive idiocy.

Dr. Thompson

A reversal of this nature could not service our present consumptive state. He foresees a productive, conserving society in which technology is minimized.

Queen's growth studied

by Paul Finkel

Facing a University population that is expected to fall by 15-20 percent below 1976 levels in the mid-nineteen eighties, the Campus Planning Committee has recently been discussing proposals for the long term development of the University. While explaining that University growth within the next twenty years is "very unlikely", Co-Chairman of the Committee Dr. R.D. Norman (Mathematics) stressed the fact that the discussions on the subject of future development are not designed to create a definite and detailed set of long term policies.

The Committee is primarily concerned with trying to set future University developments in a general perspective, and secondly, to update or discard previous plans "to provide clear understanding of past-policy making", and, if viable, reassess some past policies with a view to making future proposals. Current schemes seem to indicate that rather than construct new buildings, expenditures (when funds are available) will be devoted to the renovation of existing structures.

The Campus Planning Committee is in charge of studying and recommending to the Senate and the Board of Trustees policies and plans for the physical development of the University. It is essentially an advisory committee which does not play an active role in the actual construction which occurs around the university. However, all plans for construction or renovations are supposed to be presented to the committee for consideration before any action is undertaken.

Religious Symposium - Leaders speak out

"Mankind must come together, and through religious means, or we will destroy ourselves," said Stephen Boal, speaking for the Baha'i faith, at the World Religions Symposium. The symposium, sponsored by the Baha'i club and held Jan. 17 in Stirling Hall attracted about 70 spectators. Five other speakers, each representing a major religion, spoke of their respective faiths, stressing the similarities and the differences between them.

Mrs. Lakshmi Ranganathan, speaking on behalf of the Hindu faith, initiated the discussion. Hinduism is a pantheistic religion with a multitude of gods and goddesses representing fire, water, wealth, destruction and many other specifics. Mrs. Ranganathan emphasized that religion affected almost all aspects of daily life for a believer, and could be seen in all things and in all actions.

Rabbi Horowitz, from the Beth Israel Synagogue, spoke on Judaism. He began with the concept of God, from which all other Judaic concepts flow. God, the creator, made the universe and man, and in doing so gave man a purpose. Morality and duty are derived from this and so "we are all equally precious... we are our brother's keeper." Men are responsible to God, but we have freedom of choice.

Dharmin Shakyin, from the Toronto Zen Centre, explained Zen Buddhism to the audience. His talk first focussed on Buddha, the founder of the religion, and his support of 'the middle way', avoiding all extremes, which contributes toward making the religion a way of life. Buddha's great spiritual discovery was that "all men are whole and complete as they are, lacking nothing," which enabled him and his followers to comprehend the wholeness and the universal quality of the world. Buddhism therefore concentrates on the world and not on the individual ego.

Padre Lavery, the Queen's University chaplain, spoke on Christianity. He opened with a quotation from Christ: "He that hath seen me hath seen the father," and suggested that people accept religion not from outside evidence but from an inner conviction of the heart. God is not an abstract philosophical concept but the "mighty personality of religious doctrine," whose existence is only proved by Himself. Man is given the ability to identify and choose between good and evil freely, and must choose in his life.

The Muslim faith was described by Dr. Rohman of the Islamic Club of Kingston, who offered many quotations from the Koran, the Islamic holy book. He stressed Islam's similarity to other monotheistic religions, saying that Muslims believe in all the divine revelations in the Judaeo-Christian tradition, through to the last, Mohammed. According to Dr. Rohman, a day of judgement will come when all men will account for their deeds.

Stephen Boal ended the presentations with an explanation of the Baha'i faith. Viewing all prophets and their religions as manifestations of one God suitable to a particular time and people. The Baha'is believe that man alone interprets God; he alone has a capacity for truth and the ability to recognize it. With that ability, comes a duty to act upon the truth and the laws.

Little mention was made of some of the problems which have been worrying the established religions, at least in the west, except by Mrs. Ranganathan who was speaking of the younger generation: "It's a modern world, it's all changing. They don't believe in God and all those things."

Mordecai Richler and Irving Layton

Contemporary Canadian writers at Queen's

Of Canada's contemporary writers, two of the most popular—poet, Irving Layton and novelist, Mordecai Richler—will be at Queen's University during Arts Festival Week, Monday, Jan. 24 to Saturday, Jan. 29.

Mr. Layton, a professor of English at York University in Toronto for the past eight years, is scheduled to give a poetry reading, Monday, Jan. 24 at 8 p.m. in Stirling Hall, theatre A.

A prolific poet, Mr. Layton has written 31 books of original poetry, besides editing two anthologies of Canadian verse. He is also an accomplished short story writer.

He was born in Romania in 1912 but has lived in Canada—mainly Montreal—since he was one year old. He received his BSc. from Macdonald College, McGill University, spent a short time in the army, then took his MA in political science at McGill. All the while, he was writing conventional Tennysonian verse.

"As an adolescent, I wrote poetry as naturally as you drink water" but there were pressures for him to become a businessman or tradesman—not a poet.

His first wife, Betty, introduced him to the modern poets. He was 30 years old and it was 1942. Between 1945 and 1968 he published 20 volumes of original modern poetry, winning for himself an enthusiastic readership. For his collection A Red Carpet For the Sun, he received, in 1960, the Governor-General's Award.

He considers his poems a "running commentary on experience—a parable," others have dismissed his work as blunt and shocking. Yet few will deny that Irving Layton has had a dramatic impact on Canadian poetry in the past two decades.

On Tuesday, Jan. 25, Mordecai Richler, who, like Layton, is outspoken and controversial in his opinions, will lecture about Canadian writing at 8 p.m. in Dunning Hall Auditorium.

Mr. Richler came to the forefront of Canada's literary profession with his novel, The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz. In 1971, a film version of his best-selling book was produced in Montreal and Mr. Richler did the screenplay for it.

Born in Montreal in 1931 of Jewish parents, Mr. Richler was educated at Sir George Williams University. After a brief stint with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, he left for Spain where he completed his first novel, The Acrobats, at the age of 22.

For the next two decades he lived throughout Europe and wrote film scripts and books, including Duddy Kravitz, Son of a Smaller Hero, and St. Urbain's Horseman.

He has twice won the Governor-General's Award.

Long periods of absence from Canada have mellowed Mr. Richler's attitude towards his homeland. Canada, he believes, is no longer as

Executive nomination received

Hugh Christie, Gord Howe and Jodi Button have successfully secured the 250 signatures necessary to be nominated for next year's AMS executive. Christie, presently External Affairs Commissioner, is seeking the office of President while Gord Howe, Speaker of Outer Council, and Jodi Button, Community Liaison Officer will support Christie in the offices of Vice-President of Operations and University Affairs respectively.

Nominations close at 5 p.m. today and thus far it appears that Christie will be the sole entry. In the event of an uncontested election, Christie will take office by acclamation. A similar situation developed two years ago when a team led by John Gray took office uncontested. If Christie is not forced to go to the polls, he plans to set his platform before the student body by means of visits to the University residences and an article to be published in a future edition of the Journal.

stuffy and parochial as it once was and he considers the climate of Canadian writing better than ever.

A frequent contributor to Canadian magazines, Mr. Richler is currently working on a new novel in his Montreal home.

The educational commission of the Alma Mater Society, Queen's student government, is sponsoring the 1977 Arts Festival Week. Other activities planned are: an art show; a demonstration of crafts; lunch-time lectures, showings of student-made films, concerts, skating, modern dance and gymnastic performances.

Students malnourished?

Canada food week upcoming

by Timmy Greenwood

Do you feel "poorly nourished and economically abused?" If so, Canada Food Week, February 11-19, might provide you with possible reasons and solutions for this unfortunate state, for this cross-Canada "celebration" will be observed at Queen's.

Kathy Wood, AMS Vice President (University Affairs), and Kathy Grant (AMS Researcher) have united the event with the Student Health Centre's policy of "preventive medicine", in order to sharpen the focus of the week. They have contacted the Department of Health and Welfare, whose Lifestyle program, involving questionnaires and fitness testing, will be incorporated into the week. Two of the testers to be sent by Health and Welfare are graduates from Physical Education at Queen's.

Malnourishment among students has been attributed by the Canada Food Week people to those who rely "exclusively on the campus cafeteria, residence-dining hall and vending machines", for their meals. The truth of this statement with regard to Queen's, as well as other health matters, will be examined at residences around the Campus, where questionnaires concerning eating and health habits will be handed out and fitness testing will take place.

Nationally, the organizers of the event say that the aim of Canada Food Week is to provide an opportunity for "all citizens to participate in food education and to begin to develop citizen-based national food policies." On university campuses across Canada examinations into campus food, food co-ops, food at campus day-care centres will be conducted. At some campuses there may be a special Canada Food Week Valentine dinner.

Kathy Wood told the Journal that to date PHEA is the only group on Campus working on the Week, but said that "the invitation is open for anyone to participate." Ms. Wood hopes that the medical and nursing faculties will become involved and feels that the Residence Societies might benefit from an examination of the food on Campus. If anyone is interested they are requested to contact Kathy Wood or Kathy Grant at the AMS office or call 547-6165.

James Bay: a lesson

by Gerry Lewarne

The extent to which multinational corporations reinforce each other's interest is almost beyond our understanding. This statement captures the essence of the Student Christian Movement meeting held on Tuesday, January 18. The meeting was the first in a series entitled "The Christian and Corporate Control."

Wayne Miles, a researcher at the Queen's International Centre, led the discussion which centred around the James Bay Power Project and how it shows the methods used by large multinationals.

James Bay is a Quebec Hydro project. To pay for its massive construction Quebec Hydro borrowed money from the Chase-Manhattan Bank, the Rothschilds and Japanese interests. The project will be completed in 1982 and it will produce 12,000 megawatts of power. The Quebec government estimates that it will need that much but independent researchers have concluded that Quebec will need only 7,000 megawatts.

In the past, Quebec has shipped its excess power to Consolidated Edison of New York. Chase-Manhattan owns Consolidated Edison. Brinco, a mining company, anticipates moving into the James Bay area. This was not previously possible because of the lack of roads. The Rothschilds own Brinco.

The cost to the public for the James Bay Project is very substantial. Firstly, the cost of repaying the loan made by Quebec Hydro will result in higher power rates for the consumer. Secondly, the Northern Cree way-of-life will be destroyed. Thirdly, due to the enormous areas that will be flooded, there will be substantial (and unknown) effects on the environment.

The discussion then moved to multinationals and their involvement in the Third World. When asked if he would like to see the underdeveloped countries have a standard of living like that of Canada, Mr. Miles said, "I would not wish to force my standard of living upon the Third World because I think the Canadian standard of living has made us morally bankrupt."

Laval Strike Settled

A four month strike by Laval University professors, which cancelled classes for 25,000 students, has ended with faculty making considerable gains in their demands.

After 18 months of bargaining and the longest strike at any Canadian university, the faculty union voted 85 per cent Dec. 23 to approve a contract that provides a 34 per cent wage hike as well as a grievance procedure, job security, a sabbatical leave system, a salary structure and increased decision making power in the university.

Students began the first of two thirteen week terms Jan. 11. Classes will extend to early July, instead of the usual mid-April, to make up lost time.

Under the new contract, grievances about tenure, promotions, and non-renewal of professor contracts will be arbitrated by an internal committee composed of university representatives, union president Joel de la Noue said in a recent interview.

The new agreement provides full job security by disallowing the firing of tenured faculty, although they must agree to changes in job description, said de la Noue. Positions cannot be removed without departmental approval, he added.

Roberts gets boot at Waterloo

The University of Waterloo student Federation President Shane Roberts has been forced from office for "inactivity on his election platform" and his role in the closure of the campus newspaper after a precedent-setting recall petition signed by 2240 students was presented to him Dec. 15.

Roberts is the first Waterloo student president to be recalled.

The petition contained 2240 names, 99 more than Roberts polled in his Feb. 1976 election.

Students supporting the reinstatement of the paper were central in circulating the petition.

But the federation has instead sponsored a referendum, initiated by Roberts, asking students to vote on a series of eight questions about the future of the Chevron-federation relations.

Federation vice-president Dace McLellan, who officially became interim president Dec. 28, said he sees the referendum as a chance for students to express their feelings on the Chevron-federation dispute.

Interview with Ken Keyes

Student participation needed

by Maben Smith

Kingston's newly elected mayor, Ken Keyes feels that Queen's students are conservative by nature—something he feels the city appreciates. In an interview with the Journal, he said that Queen's students have contributed and will continue to contribute much to the life of the city.

Mayor Keyes encourages as many interested students as possible to utilize their experiences towards active interaction with City Hall. The contribution that students make can be realized in at least three of his committees (concerning housing, the future growth of the City and the waterfront). Mayor Keyes senses the concern that today's younger people have with regard to their environment.

Keyes would also like Queen's students to utilize the liaison office of the A.M.S. The Mayor would like to see Queen's students attend the appropriate City Council meetings. As a further note, Keyes mentioned he heartily endorses the present arrangement between the University and P.U.C. concerning bus fares. He feels "Bus-it" is a good scheme and as a member of the P.U.C. will promote its furtherance. In discussing other issues, the Mayor perceives one of the most pressing to be the reference, in a provincial study of the future growth of Eastern Ontario, of Kingston as the "center of growth." He would like an examination into the implications of such a statement. Keyes is concerned not with the prospects but with the terminology. He questions whether the government refers to industrial or residential growth. As a member of the Planning Board for the last two years, Keyes has become sceptical of such references to the City. The Planning Board has accounted for all land within the City limits, leading him to conclude that such growth, whichever form, is apparently taken in the context of the neighbouring townships. It is critical, says the Mayor, that City Council decide whether the City should play an active role in such development. If it does decide to participate, the City could consider annexing or expropriating part of the adjacent lands to ensure additional municipal revenues.

Amongst other issues that the Mayor intends to view carefully is included the type of multiple dwelling units that are proposed for construction in the city. Keyes feels the acute shortage of apartment space calls for immediate action. He does not, however, support condominium row housing as endorsed by the Provincial Government. Such dwellings as are proposed for the City by developers, do not include the amenities that are customarily found in other cities. Regular condominium apartments are more acceptable to Keyes.

Developments in the downtown area will, according to the Mayor, swing into action early this year. The Teron property will be sold to a new developer, while the Place d'Armes project should be well underway by late spring. Keyes states he will use his office to the greatest extent in order to promote such developments, without guaranteeing their success. The taxpayers cannot be expected to underwrite a private business venture but can be depended on to give all appropriate assistance.

Group wants suggestions

The Brockington Visitor Committee welcomes suggestions for future Visitors from members of the University Community. They should be sent to the Committee, c/o the Office of the Chaplain, Room No. 102, Phys Ed Centre. It would be helpful if material in support of the suggestion(s) was included.

"The terms of reference of the Committee are to select and invite each year an outstanding Visitor of international reputation to come to Queen's for four to five days to meet and discuss informally with students and faculty, individually and in groups, subjects which are of particular interest to the Visitor. The Visitor is also asked to participate in a small number of more formal occasions and to give one public lecture—the Brockington Lecture on a topic of his own choosing. Basically, the idea is to invite someone who is an articulate spokesman on subjects of current importance, who is interested in discussing these with students and faculty in an informal way."

Run a shuttle service

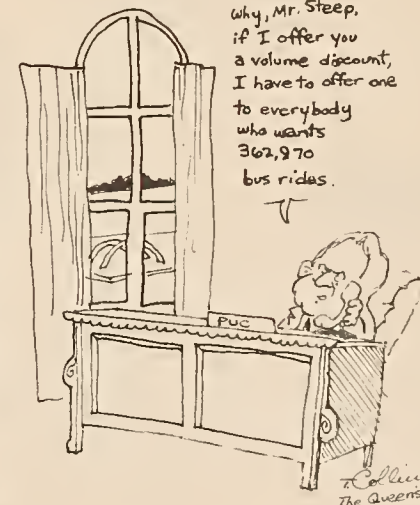

The bus-it debate has re-emerged on campus. As in previous years, current discussion revolves around the recent announcement by the Public Utilities Commission (PUC) that the cost of the service will be raised to reflect the five cent fare increase imposed last summer. The fare increase was not included in this year's Bus-it price. Moreover, the Commission has assessed Bus-it on the basis of 362,970 rides, as opposed to 350,000 last year. Thus next year we are offered Bus-it for a total cost of 109,891, an escalation in price of $22,000.

Presently the cost of Bus-it is shared between the AMS and the University, each paying 60 percent and 40 percent respectively. During last year's debate the University served notice that it no longer considered itself committed to paying its traditional 40 percent share of the Bus-it cost and insisted that in future it would support the scheme on "a dollar figure per student". It has now transpired that the University will refuse to increase its contribution next year, forcing students to bear the cost of the prospective price increase in its entirety. This would amount to an extra $2.80 each, approximately, bringing the total cost per student to $8.15.

We support AMS Vice-President Paul Steep in his position that without a volume discount, the AMS will not enter into the agreement next year. Eighty percent of the students at Queen's live within easy walking distance of the main campus. Those who use the buses and are not residents of West Campus, should pay according to their demands for the service. West Campus residents who commute by bus through necessity should, in all fairness, be provided between the two campuses to ensure against the isolation of the satellite campus.

The PUC, unfortunately, has priced itself right out of competition with the obvious alternative available to Queen's, namely, a shuttle bus service. The cost of such an alternative has been estimated at $40,000.

If the PUC fails to agree to the reasonable volume discount proposal made by the AMS, Queen's should terminate Bus-it and institute a shuttle bus system to service the West Campus.

A word of caution

by David Gay

Abortion is a subject I have never really thought about and have no experience with. But for some reason I find myself writing about it, perhaps more out of uncertainty than any clear-cut conviction.

I spoke to a physician who told me not to think about it because I have no medical experience. He assured me that it is a unique and trying situation and that he could not find in his heart to turn away scared and frightened people on some vague, philosophical basis. I hadn't come to argue, but I might mention one other thing that he said that did bother me. He supposed that an ideal society would be one in which birth control was so advanced and universal that it would drastically reduce the number of unwanted pregnancies.

This is the same attitude American and Soviet politicians use to curb global violence. Many world leaders subscribe to the "arms beyond doubt" hypothesis which states that only when nations have enough nuclear weapons to destroy the world can we be assured that it will never happen because no one will dare to use them. The money spent on rockets should be given to the poor, but politicians consider that dangerous and so appeals of that nature are just random footnotes.

I am not saying that "birth pills beyond doubt" would fail to reduce the number of unwanted pregnancies. I am saying that the establishment of cafeterias full of heaping, buffet-style selections of little colored pills, toys, and gadgets might be a giant leap forward in a dog kennel but surely not for mankind. I may sound naive but I find it irritating that in 2000 years, archaeologists will survey our ruins and decide that ours was the civilization that spent the most money on sex.

In light of this finding, they will dig up all the nuclear missiles and mistake them for works of art, giant phallic sculptures done by sculptors whose creativity was supported by the largest slice of the American fiscal budget. (On the other hand, if they figure out what the missiles were for then they will be forced to conclude that all the little pills are suicide capsules.)

Do you see, buffet-style birth control and nuclear weapons are related. Both stress man's animal nature. And both are further examples of man's reliance on technology to construct a "kingdom on earth", a kingdom in which man is self-fulfilled, his modus operandi is convenience, and the idea that there might be a God is dispensable. (Perhaps I should use words like "church" or "religion". In an increasingly stratified society men have less and less of a common religious vocabulary. (In any event, here I go again.)

This technological satisfaction of man's strangest appetite, to be finite and complete in himself, has made any spiritual approach to the question of abortion an option rather than standard equipment. This makes the life of the unborn child a "burning social issue" commented upon by a blight of sociologists who express the problem as it relates to inflation, unemployment, and even fruit flies. But it is when man attains this arrogant sense of self-fulfillment that he becomes most susceptible to moral crime.

The society in history which best succeeded in eliminating the religious perspective was Nazi Germany. In Nazi Germany, industrialists would worship God on Sunday morning and discuss the extermination of the Jews on Sunday afternoon, perhaps expressing it as it related to the economy. Hold on, I am not comparing abortion to Nazi war crimes. I am saying that men can go to church and commit atrocities without any sense of contradiction if the type of society they choose to construct is one in which a religious perspective is dispensable.

Western man may be far too sophisticated (or ashamed) to shed his own blood but that does not mean we are not heading towards a God-less society. And it is for that reason that I feel no crime is committed when someone who is scared and frightened, and living in a scientific jungle at the limit of her resources, has an abortion. I have no other judgments to make than that But it does scare me that the same man who is glowingly grateful as he awaits the arrival of his first child can also curl up in the waiting room armchair and agree with a magazine article which is pro-abortion because he is concerned about its relation to pollution and unemployment. He can do this with no sense of contradiction. It is his capability. It is also his curse.

AMS officers need salary

Dear Editor,
Recently, AMS Vice President (Operations) Paul Steep has prepared a report on the salary structure that should be followed by the AMS in dealing with its salaried student employees. He does not reach any specific conclusions concerning the executive positions, but he does have this to say:

"It should be obvious that the AMS is a large and diverse organization. Its activities encompass everything from pubs, to publications, to politics. Yearly the demands made on its executive officers increase. No one could fail to notice the criticisms levelled at the AMS this fall in a variety of instances. (Who's Where springs immediately to mind). To me this is evidence of a paradox that has existed within the Society for far too long. On the one hand students' expectations grow each year: they want the AMS to provide more services, and they want them to run more professionally. On the other hand they demand that these same individuals be students and by extrapolation there is the implicit assumption made that these individuals are capable of doing two difficult jobs very well. Many of them are but many are not. But what is really disturbing and what is bound to be damaging in the long run is the perpetuation of the fallacy that Queen's can expect more and more from its student leaders while at the same time expecting them to stay unsalaried and to maintain their full-time student status. It is quite legitimate to expect the AMS executive to remain unsalaried if you are willing to accept the reduced level of service you would receive from this type of individual. You cannot however keep demanding more of the executive while at the same time denying them the resources to do more. That is what salary is; it is a personal resource that would allow a President or a Vice-President to reduce his course load and work for the AMS. If you do not want this type of arrangement then you do not want all the things the AMS presently provides for the Queen's community. If you want a part-time executive that treats the AMS as an important, but none-the-less, extra operation, then you do not want the type of student government that runs a Pub, a newspaper, a typing service, represents you on numerous University committees and insures that a great deal of day to day work is completed. My experience has been that Queen's students must decide between these two alternatives, and the latter can only be attained through the implementation of salaries.

If people are not willing to think in these terms then they must begin to think in terms of an AMS that does not do so much as it presently does. I submit that the logical thing to do would be to rescind honoraria payments and set up a salary schedule for the executive governed by the AMS Outer Council and the Board of Directors. These same bodies should be granted the authority to set salaries for the Journal Editor, the QSA Director and the Commissioners.

I am fully aware that the Board does not have the authority to act on this before it has been passed by referendum. I would recommend that the necessary steps be taken to have this issue put to referendum within the next year. When the current honoraria schedule was established, the AMS like Queen's itself, was far smaller, less complex, and less ambitious than it is now. Queen's is one of the few universities in Ontario where the Student President is not full time and salaried. I do not suggest we adopt such an approach, partially because I think all executive members deserve some salary and partially because I do not think any student executive should be required to abandon academic interests even for a year. The AMS has been quite negligent, however, in failing to expand the remuneration given to executive officers at a rate comparable to the expanded responsibilities they bear.

I hope it is clear that neither Paul or myself have any conflict of interest in recommending salaries for the AMS executive. We will not be around to gain anything from such a policy. We are simply trying to give the benefit of our experience to the AMS. The AMS pays many students including constables, pub staff, and business managers. Why should it not pay its highest ranking officers?

Jamie Avis, AMS President.

Letter to Steep

Make Bus-it optional

Dear Editor:
The following letter was sent to Paul Steep.

Dear Mr. Steep,

I have followed with interest, the warfare between the AMS and the PUC over the "Bus-it" issue, during the past three academic years. In 1975 and 1976, the problems were resolved, after some difficulty, and the service continued. But now, in 1977, looking toward the next school year, there seems to be little hope for the continuation of this service. According to Monday's and Tuesday's issues of the Whig-Standard, the threat of discontinuation appears to be much more serious. Will "Bus-it" continue into the next school year?

The problem is the money that the PUC wishes to charge us for this privilege. Certainly, $110,000.00 is a sizeable amount. But that still only works out to $11.00 per student. Granted, this is an unfair charge to the students who rarely use the buses, but it is a fraction of what those of us who use the buses regularly would pay. For us, it is a necessary and worthwhile service. I suppose that I speak mainly for those of us who live in the peripheral areas of Kingston (Calvin Park, Hillendale, Kingscourt, Montreal Street, Polson Park, Portsmouth, and Strathcona Park), and although I have no figures to indicate how many of us are involved, I'd be willing to bet that it represents a fair-sized chunk of the student body. Those of us living in those areas would find a 60 cent per day cost of travel to and from campus to be a substantial monetary concern.

I wonder also if this might not lead to further difficulties in the off-campus housing situation. I'm sure that more of us would be looking for accommodation closer to campus, leading to a greater amount of competition for living space. Could landlords be tempted to raise their rents, given the greater demand for their property? And if overcrowding occurred, wouldn't this further strain the relationships between the students and the residents of Kingston?

The solution seems fairly obvious: simply make "Bus-it" an optional service, available to those who want it. This is entirely reasonable at $11.00 per person, without any subsidy from the university. Even at $20. per person, it can still represent a saving. A card, or a small sticker placed on our student card (somewhat like the one the Phys. Ed. Centre sells us) would easily identify those who paid for the service. Therefore, I would urge you to consider this possibility and present it to the PUC.

A University what? (the educated 'elite')

by Howard Smith

Certain attitudes of university students are flagrantly stupid and offensive. Prevailing theories that the university elite seem quick to pick up are the notions that the only way to be educated is to get a degree, and that the only intelligent people are those that have done so.

Intelligence, insofar as it can be defined, is not the monopoly of tertiary students alone. Not only are there many intelligent "uneducated" people in this world, but also we have our share of the unintelligent "educated".

Education is not, as many seem to believe, something which one proves by pointing at the diploma pasted to the wall. Inasmuch as we believe it ends when we accept our degrees, we may never in fact be educated. This elusive state is really a lifetime habit, and if our years in the system haven't imparted such a habit, our degrees do not.

It is the lamentable truth that, at least in part, our education system strategically annihilates the very qualities it is committed to create, producing that inimitable member of our society, the "educated elite". Natural educational qualities such as curiosity and creativity are devastated at the hands of restrictive curricula. Any practical education is forfeit to the priorities of trigonometry, Paradise Lost and the geography of Pakistan. Students leave school without any formal education in sex, marriage, why Dad pays 40 percent of his earnings to a mortgage company, or what opportunities exist for them in the "real world". To this purposeful design to teach the irrelevant, fold in a genuine commitment to treating young adults as young children and you have the recipe for a monumentally effective system of non-education.

The bad taste of school lingers on in the mouth of the average high school graduate for years to come. Anything even vaguely smacking of education, that is school, reviles him. Some of us have more stamina - we stick with the "game" for another 4, 6, or 7 years. When it's over, unfortunately all too often, it is indeed over.

The only true formula for education is a lifelong habit of learning. The degree is only the "tip of the iceberg" relative to the whole education. Whether or not the educators of our land are aware of what an education really is, there is little forthcoming to do any more than turn out the same kind of widgets.

Urges Journal to leave CUP

Dear Editor:

Aside from the serious news and events orientation of this paper, it is also viewed as a forum for responsible debate. For this reason the offices of the Journal are open to one and all and the Queen's student should make use of this invaluable aid in his or her personal search for the truth. To bring this polemic closer to home, come down and take a good hard look at the stacks of C.U.P. copy. Now have a good laugh before you realize that the Journal pays $3,800 a year (with roughly a 70 percent increase expected for next year) for the privilege of being inundated with this trash.

While the C.U.P. branch service, "Youthstream advertising" has been the salvation of less financially fortunate newspapers, supplying vast amounts of cash for full page Tequila ads, the Journal does not need or use this service. In fact the Journal rarely uses C.U.P. material as it is often biased, poorly written or trivial. In short, it shows the same journalistic expertise (or lack of it) as found in high school newspapers and -or the editorial page of the Whig-Standard.

Three thousand eight hundred bucks could provide pizzas for starving layout workers, could fill our top writer with 90 proof inspiration, could buy a layout table, could finance informal projects workshops (staff parties!) The resulting torrent of inspired material would more than compensate for the lack of the C.U.P. services.

The question is why does the Journal remain a member (under protest) at all? If the current clique at the C.U.P. are so interested in off beat left-wing idealism they should devote their energies to it for sure, but not our (and the Queen's student has a stake in the Journal) fee money. Are they a news service or agents for enlightened social change (laugh all you want, they laugh last, to a healthy tune.)

Perhaps, like a sorrowing mad doctor, the Journal still clings to its creation, even though it has gone berserk. The Journal might have been a founding member of C.U.P. but its loyalties and its funds are apparently misplaced.

Unless the rising anger at the irresponsibility of the Canadian University Press turns to action and unless the current clique is ousted in favour of responsible leadership, the Queen's Journal should divest itself of all ties with C.U.P. and devote its energies and resources to other, perhaps alternate and more responsible, means.

QUEEN'S WOMEN'S CENTRE

by Joni Blishen

Women's Liberation is not a passing fad but a reality of today's society and according to Alanna Ruddell, a co-ordinator with the Queen's Women's Centre, the organization's main concern is in "helping University women adjust to this fact."

Women's Centres as serious organizations are relatively new phenomena and the efforts at Queen's in the early 1970's were a miserable failure. Most women were aware that their position had altered since the days of their "ancestors," but few seemed willing to risk any form of "banding together" for mutual support.

A few interested students linked up with the struggling Kingston Women's Centre and soon decided that the time was ripe for attempting a similar group on Campus. In the fall of International Women's Year, the Queen's Women's Centre was set up in a comfortable garret-like room in the Student's Union where it operated through a $600.00 budget granted by the A.M.S.

Since then a concerted effort has been made towards a type of feminist education program for Queen's women as well as the women of the Kingston community. The growing pains have all but subsided now and the interest and enthusiasm of those involved have led to the creation of numerous informative activities undertaken throughout the school year.

Rape symposiums, film presentations and courses in self-defense have been used in the past and continue to be used as vehicles for awareness.

During registration in the fall, the Women's Centre solicited for names of those women interested in taking a course on self-defense. The response was much greater than anticipated (125 signatures) and thought was given to continuing the programme in future years. The P.E. center is responsible at present but work is still underway. The course offers women the basics in simple self-defense as a means to increasing confidence when approached by a would-be assailant.

The increasing number of rapes in the Kingston area served as a catalyst for the programme while at the same time stimulating ideas regarding the formation of a Rape Crisis Center. "Various people have been trying for a center for years," said Ms. Ruddell, "but since we need the statistics to show the government...we are still working on it."

A two-to-three day Rape Symposium will be held later in the year, "half on Campus and half elsewhere in Kingston" at which time panel discussions will be conducted and a recently purchased A.M.S. film on Rape will be shown. "It is important that women be informed as to what to do if they get raped and who to contact." Consequently, the Center will have a booklet on Rape Information available "within a month or two."

The stress on educating women to take part in their new role in society has been the main focus of this year's members. A belief that "things really have changed" sparked off a co-operative letter writing campaign against the idea of Suzie-Q week. "We were against the background philosophy," said Ms. Ruddell, "why should there be a special social week set aside when 52 weeks of the year should be Suzie-Q week." Next year the Center hopes to gain support in planning an alternative, Women's Week, to serve not so much as a series of social events as an informal information session.

A possible precursor to such an event is under consideration at present and owes much to a research project undertaken through the Office of the Dean of Women. The project, which seeks to trace the beginnings of a Suffragist Movement at Queen's, would provide the background for a Women's History Week.

According to the findings so far, the women alumni of years gone by were quite vocal when the administration refused to provide women's residences. The suffragist movement eventually won its case and Chown Hall and Ban Righ bear witness to their efforts. The History Week would concentrate not only on the efforts of past Queen's women, but also the work of the Canadian Suffragist Movement.

Since these early days of women's rights the unique problems of the career woman in the working world have become major issues. A lunchtime film series and panel discussion have been organized by the Women's Centre concerning the change in values and the adaptations that must be faced. "We hope the turn-out is a good one," said Ms.

Ruddell, "not just from Queen's but from Kingston as a whole."

The hard work and co-operative concern put forth by the members of this year's center is an encouraging sign for years to come. The involvement has been good so far and despite the small number of male members, Alanna seems confident that attitudes have changed. The general awareness and understanding of Women's Liberation seems to be on the rise and "often the men are willing to accept the change" whereas women are still struggling to really free themselves.

The flexibility of the organization leaves all doors open and allows for future groups to decide which goal they will pursue. "We were mainly concerned with settling things up and getting them rolling. Next year's members can carry on from there."

For those who are still attempting to come to grips with the concepts surrounding Women's Liberation, the Queen's Women's Centre offers an outlet for frustrations and questions. The library is filled with useful literature, the people are friendly, the surroundings are comfortable and there's always a chance for a good exchange of ideas.

Jan. 24 - Jan. 27 - Queen's Women's Centre is sponsoring a series of films and lectures on Women in Careers. See what's happening for details.

"Dames at Sea" - Queen's Musical Theatre

Tap-dancing their way into your heart

Roosevelt was president, Shirley Temple was number one box-office star, television was no household word-it was something to dream about, or hear about on Flash Gordon, like landing on the moon. There was a depression, sure, but with faith in the New Deal, the ol' U.S. of A. was sure to pull through, (it always did). The optimism became the trademark of the era. "Happy Days are here again!" proclaimed the song (years before Streisand was born), and the world buoyed its spirits with treacly stage and musical shows.

Dames at Sea is a pastiche of all the musical comedy films and shows of the Thirties. It boasts just about every type of song the Thirties had, torch songs, sweet love songs, railroad songs, ("Choo Choo Honeymoon"), a beguine (full of sensuous latin rhythms) and lots and lots of tap dancing. The chorus taps, the sailors tap, even the captain of the ship can tap!

The minimal plot is a parody of the Warner Brothers musicals of the mid-thirties whose director, Busby Berkley, became famous for his grouping of beautiful girls around fountains and airplanes etc., rather than for his marvellous work as an acting coach.

Mona Kent is a star. She is temperamental to the point of refusing to perform unless everything is just SO. Ruby (a la Ruby Keeler) is a young tapper from Centerville, Ohio. She comes to Broadway to be in a show and is helped into the chorus by the brassy, wisecracking, gum-chewing chorine, Joan (Joan Blondell, perhaps?) Ruby, of course, has left all her belongings at the train station; but sailor-boy Dick (as in Powell) has followed her to the theatre. He gives her her belongings, (why else would he be following her?), and they fall immediately in love.

HOWEVER - star Mona Kent finds Dick equally attractive and promises to use his songs, (of course he writes songs, what sailors don't?) in her show. All seems lost when the theatre is found to be condemned, but Dick and his best friend Lucky announce that Dames at Sea can be done on their ship whose captain (Capt. Courageous) is an old flame of the multi-talented Mona. Thus ends Act 1.

Act II untangles all of these loose ends to the satisfaction of all (including the director - an Adolphe Menjou-type of hot-head).

Dames at Sea, as the Queen's Musical Theatre is presenting it, is a big show. There is a large chorus of singers and dancers - most of whom are finding that tapping is not as hard as it looks. The bright and sassy choreography has been done by Sandra Aitken and Cathy Brouse (who is also in the show - a resident "How do you do this step?" answerer). Bruce Kyle directs the acting (what there is of it - the show is almost three-quarters music), and Judith Bourne takes care of the music side.

Dames at Sea will play next Tuesday through Saturday nights (January 25-29 inclusive). Tickets are available at the Grand Box Office and are on sale in the main corridor of Mac-Corry.

Piano Recital

Concert pianist Tom Plaunt will give a piano recital, under the sponsorship of the Music Department in Harrison-LeCaine Hall, Queen's Crescent, on Friday, 21 January 1977, at 8:30p.m.

The programme Mr. Plaunt will play spans in time from the Renaissance to the Twentieth Century and includes William Byrd's "Pavan and Galliard", John Rea's "Anaphora II" (John Rea is currently a composer in the Music Faculty at McGill U.), Mozart's "Sonata in F Major K 533 and 494", and Maurice Ravel's "Miroirs".

Born in northern Ontario, Plaunt studied at the Royal Conservatory of Music in Toronto. The winner of two prizes in national competitions for student composers, he undertook further musical studies in Germany where he spent four years studying piano and conducting with Hanns-Ulrich Kunze and Martin Stephani and the Nordwestdeutsche Musikakademie Detmold under a German Government scholarship.

Since returning to Canada and joining the Faculty of Music at McGill, about three years ago, Mr. Plaunt has given a number of recitals in Ontario and Quebec and recorded for CBC radio. He is a founding member of the Bella Ensemble of Montreal.

As well as the recital on Friday evening, Mr. Plaunt will conduct a piano masterclass on Saturday morning in Harrison-LeCaine Hall, beginning at 10 a.m. Both events are open to the public, admission free.

What IS CFRC?

Sitting in a lecture hall between classes I was talking to a friend about CFRC. "So you work at the radio station," he said, "how much do you get paid for that?" It took a little explaining to convince him that I didn't get paid anything. In fact, with the exception of the Station Manager and his assistant, I told him, no one is paid at CFRC. "But if you're not paid, why do you spend so much time working there?" he asked. Fortunately the next lecture started before I could express the usual clichés about rewards not necessarily being monetary.

His questions did give me something to think about. How often have I run across misconceptions about Queensradio? Nearly everyone I talked to about CFRC had no clue about the management, programming, funding, or student involvement. Some were not even aware that Queen's had a radio station. This article is an attempt to inform Queen's students about CFRC and to correct some of the fallacies.

Perhaps the most annoying misconception to someone who puts a lot of effort into programming is that Queensradio is not a real radio station. Maybe we don't sound as professionally polished as some commercial radio stations. Our announcers and operators are volunteers with little or no broadcasting experience, but what is lacking in technical quality is made up for by the interest our broadcasters have in the programmes they like to do.

CFRC is a non-commercial station which is owned and operated by Queen's University. All on-air broadcasting is run by a group of volunteers—the CFRC student radio club. The administration of the station is handled by Steve Cutway the Station Manager and his assistant, Gail Cunningham, who are the only paid personnel at CFRC. With the cost of equipment, records and salaries, CFRC needs some money to operate. Some students I have talked to think that the AMS pays for the radio station, or at least part of the costs. This notion seems to have come from the Student Interest Fee lists which everyone got before registration. The bottom of the list has the statement: CFRC 25c. With ten thousand students at Queen's this works out to a grand sum of $2,500—which most people would realize is not enough to run much more than a C.B. radio on!

The funding for CFRC comes from the University, primarily out of gifts from Alumni. Occasionally Queensradio will receive a gift from an alumnus of the which will be used to buy additional equipment or records outside of the operating budget. Last fall a very generous donation of about $35,000 came to CFRC from Kathleen Ryan of Ottawa which will be used to purchase a new stereo FM transmitter.

What of the student's $2,500? That is used for the cost of broadcasting in sports. Each fall CFRC broadcasts all the Golden Gael football games, and since the winter many of the hockey games are also heard on Queensradio. Since we broadcast the games live, using long distance phone lines, the cost is considerable. The University feels that the broadcast of sports events is mainly of interest to the students and they should bear the expense.

One of the things which I find most students do not realize is that anyone can join the CFRC student radio club. (That is, anyone who is a member of the Queen's community—student, staff member, faculty, or alumni.) You don't require experience and we can teach you to be an announcer or an operator in three lessons. We have a meeting every Monday night in our studios in the basement of Carruthers Hall at seven thirty. If you want to join or find out more information feel free to come to a general meeting.

CFRC has a long history of broadcasting going back to 1922 when the station began as an electrical engineering experiment. At that time only one other station was on the air in Canada and only two in the United States. Despite our longevity a fair number of students are unaware that we exist. Our irregular broadcasting times—made necessary by the interference of our transmissions with the electrical engineering experiments—are probably responsible for the difficulty people find in picking us up. With a new stereo transmitter planned for CFRC-FM in the near future our FM broadcasts will come from off-campus where they won't interfere and consequently will be heard every day of the week. Unfortunately the AM transmitters will still be on campus and will only be used when the electrical engineering equipment is not in operation.

If you want to locate CFRC on your radio we broadcast Thursday evenings (6:30 to midnight); Friday evenings (6:30 to 2am); Saturday (noon to 2am) and Sunday (8am to midnight). Our frequencies are: CFRC 1490 and CFRC-FM 91.9. If you want a programme guide, drop into our studios during business hours.

This article hasn't answered all the misunderstandings about CFRC. About the best way to find out more is to talk to a friend who is a member of the Queensradio club—it's surprising what you can learn in ten minutes between lectures.

Artsview - On Campus.

What do you (or DO you) think about CFRC?

by Eric Hughes

To university students, the radio is by far the most important and most frequently used link to the world outside their rooms. It is more than that too. It wakes us up in the morning, it puts us to sleep at night, it gives us the background noise that many of us need to keep out other distractions while studying. Occasionally, we even listen to it.

That must remain occasionally, however, because it is more often than not simply too painful to actually listen to most AM or FM fare. If you are a fan of England Dan, John Travolta, "Stand Tall", Kiss, Queen, or "Nadia's Theme" and then AM is for you. Similarly, Mantovani, James Last, Lawrence Welk, and "101 Strings plays the music of Spain (Spanish Eyes), Greece (Zorba's Theme), and Hawaii (Aloha Oili), are yours for the taking on the FM dial. And if the music isn't enough to kill your appetite, the screamingly offensive advertisements will certainly do it for you, (especially at Christmas time. I can now do a passable impression of cathedral bells playing "White Christmas".)

CFRC, then, comes as a welcome relief. But is that all? Has it any value outside of what the station itself calls its "alternative" sound?

You might answer this question by asking a second. If all of the other radio stations in Kingston miraculously decided to start playing your favourite kind of music 24 hours a day, would you still tune to CFRC?

My answer is still yes, although a qualified one. There's a pleasant feeling that comes from the transmissions on CFRC. There's a relaxed quality (excuse that comes from the transmissions) and playing that I want to lie down in a frantic primal-therapy-like "singing" and simply breath. Instead of running song into song, large, neutral room and simply breath. Instead of running song into song, even on its light music shows, CFRC lets one cut end before the next begins. The announcers don't make bad jokes over the introductions to each number, (that doesn't mean they don't make bad jokes, but somehow these are easier to take without musical accompaniment.) And no one, but no one on CFRC screams. And I like that.

This is not intended as a paean to the glories of CFRC. On the contrary, sometimes things get TOO relaxed and lapse into an annoying unprofessionalism. Announcers get the giggles as they try to read names like "Herbert von Karajan" or "Dvorak". And as long as we're in the classics, I must say that it is on the "Classics by Request" program that most of these errors are committed. This is partly understandable as the format of the show requires a large amount of ad-libbing from the announcers, but that still doesn't excuse one DJ's calling the last movement of Beethoven's 9th "interesting". However, it's a good sign that that sort of inane comment stands out. The fact that it offends us and that we note it places it in the category of exception rather than in that of rule.

CFRC also has a number of interesting public affairs programs, some diverting readings, (although some of the readers could do with lessons in basic elocution), and a variety of specialty music shows; i.e. folk, rock, jazz, etc. They spotlight artists who come to Kingston at places like Bitter Grounds, and artists FROM Kingston performing in the Chamber Singers or what have you.

In short, CFRC offers a more varied schedule than any other radio station in our listening range; and while it may have a distinctively relaxed atmosphere, its professionalism is not inconsistent and at times could do with some punching up. However, when my radio is on on the weekends, its tuned to CFRC, and I suspect I'm not alone.

If you have anything you'd like to say about CFRC, or about this article or anything having to do with the arts on campus or off, don't hesitate to drop a line to the Journal office in care of the Arts Editor. I'd like to hear some of your thoughts and opinions, and I think the people on campus would too, so we'll print any good letters that come in on this Artsview column. Please, if you write, be sure to sign your letters.

Northern Gaels sweep thru Cornell

by Duncan Card

Last weekend Queen's once again sent a contingency of its finest athletes to represent her at the 10th Annual Cornell University Invitational Track meet. Other Universities in attendance were Penn State, Colgate, Rutgers and Syracuse just to name a few of the 22 Universities present in total.

The Queen's Track Team, as usual, did well, winning seven events including two relays and placing almost all of its athletes in the top ten positions.

In her first competition ever in the event, Leslie Lamorne won the Long Jump with a jump of 14 feet 18½ inches. Also in the women's jumps (only this time jumping in a different direction) Jean Dietrich won the women's high jump with a jump of 5 feet. Way-ta-go Dee Deel!

I think all who follow track will agree that one of the events with the greatest reputation for excitement is the 'mile'. Well, last weekend the event was made to live up to its reputation thanks to Queen's own Bob McCormack who did an excellent job of winning the mile in a time of 4 minutes; 16.6 seconds ahead of second place by one one-hundredth of a second.

In the sprints, Queen's won two more Golds when Janet Pipe won the women's 440 yard dash in a time of 1:02.9 seconds, almost a full second ahead of second place; and when Duncan Card won the 60 yard dash in a time of 6.47 seconds. Victor Gooding the ever present threat for a gold in the 60 yard dash was disqualified from the final of that event due to a false start. (NCAA rules allow no false starts).

Of the last two gold medals to be acquired by the team, one came from the victory of the men's distance medley relay team comprised of Tony Verhoeven, Dunc Card, Dale Friessen and Bob McCormack. The last gold of the day was gained when the women's 4 X 200 "A" relay team, comprised of Barb Burton, Sue Spence, Kathy Cook and Janet Pipe, won a good 6.5 seconds ahead of second place. The women's "B" team in that event (Alison Mitchell, Jean Dietrich, Marj Bousfield and Janet Henderson) placed 4th. Barb Burton, of the "A" team, also placed 4th in the final of the 60 yard dash.

Paul Tinari ran an excellent time of 2:01.3 to place 2nd overall in the 880. Placing 3rd in his first indoor high hurdle race in a couple of years was Don Price with a personal best of 8 seconds flat over 60 yds. Placing 4th in the women's mile was Anne (Gurl) MacMillan in a time of 5 minutes and 27 seconds. As well, Sue Spence placed 4th in the 880 yd final but due to a meet official's error her time was not recorded.

Deserving honourable mention are two rookies on the team this year Janet Henderson and Daniel Rochellean who did well at the first meet of their University track career. Almost last, but certainly not least, was the throw of Kevin Thompson in the men's shot put final to win third place behind the winner by only a foot.

Lastly I wish to extend on behalf of the team a warm welcome to our new manager David (Dad) Brown. Dad was with us at Cornell and we all look forward to more of his fatherly help at the upcoming York Invitational and Toronto Star Indoor Trials this weekend.

V-ball Gals

by Jill Calder

The Gals competed in an invitational meet at Waterloo this past weekend. The coach intended this to be an opportunity to "shake off the holidays" and get right down to business.

The competition was stiff: Sherbrooke is the national champ for club teams, Western is the national champ for universities, and several other provincial and out of province teams proved to be challenging.

The tally of wins to losses has suffered from the quantity and quality of the opponent at this invitational event, but the calibre of play did not. The Gals played the best defensive ball of the season to date.

They pulled from behind on several occasions and gave many teams very close games. The frequency of these close games without pulling out a victory was a frustration to the Queen's Squad but reflected a recent vacation and only three practices earlier this last week. The way these girls have switched on so fast promises a continuation of their successful season to date.

The Gals hold a three-way tie for second place in the province and look forward to challenging Western (the national champs) in London this weekend.

League points to date: (Elite League of Ontario Volleyball Association) Western 10, Queen's 6; Waterloo 6; McMaster 6; Windsor 4, and York 0.

Queen's Gals outhustle Gee Gees Ottawa gals were hot that night

by Tom Shand

In a hotly contested battle at Bartlett Gym on Tuesday evening the Queen's Basketball Gals lost a 61-55 decision to the Ottawa Gee Gees. The game was built up to be a fight for second spot in the eastern division and this was reflected in the will to win exhibited by both squads.

The loss drops the Gals record to six wins and four losses while the Gee Gees also have six wins but they have lost but one. The strength of the league, however, lies undeniably with the Laurentian team who took it to the Gals in Sudbury last weekend by a 77 to 30 score.

Against Ottawa, the Gals game was keyed on aggressive defence and moving the ball into the teams "big girl" Kim Headford. Headford had game high totals of 26 points and 10 rebounds. These totals pleased Gals coach Debbie Holts but did not surprise her. Debbie admitted that, "Against Ottawa we like to work the ball to the big girl (Headford) but against bigger teams we'll go more for the outside shot."

Penny Weed led the Gals in an aggressive defence which at times robbed Ottawa blind. However quite often these steals were not converted into points. Gals seemed to be one sharpshooter away from victory.

Queen's was behind 34-28 at halftime after the Gals Donna Roman scored 4 of her 8 points in the final 30 seconds of the half. Roman also pulled down 7 rebounds.

While the Gals outhustled Ottawa it was the Bytowners who had the sharper shooting eye. Cyndy Tyrlik led Ottawa with 25 points with Coburn and Harver scoring 12 and 8 respectively. The Gee Gees never lost their cool or control despite some brilliant efforts by the Gals to catch up. While the Gals excited the crowd with big play, including a Weed T.D. pass to Headford for a score and a 3 pointer also by Kim both in the final minutes, it was Ottawa who was the most consistent of the two teams.

Gals coach Debbie Holts preferred to think of the difference as being a "couple of breaks" and was pleased with her team's performance. I'm sure most of the enthusiastic crowd on hand felt the same way. The Gals fans get their next chance to see them in home action on January 29th against Western.

Gals lose but not through lack of effort by Penny Weed and crew. tud

Queen's Sailing

Second in N.A. sloops

by T. McLaughlin

Earlier this month in Charleston, South Carolina, Queen's University was represented by three members of its sailing team in the North American Intercollegiate Sloop Championship. The team was representing the Canadian district of the eight-member Intercollegiate Yacht Racing Association, having qualified at the Canadian Sloop Championships held in late October across the water at R.M.C. The sloop chosen for the competition was the Soling, a three-man Olympic-class yacht. Seven of the eight districts were represented, the Pacific Northwest having to withdraw because of financial difficulties. Schools rotated throughout each of the seven boats after every race.

On the first day of racing, the Queen's team of Terry McLaughlin, Peter Wilson, and Jamie Richardson got off to a good start having finishes of 1,2,1,3,2 in the five races held. They carried a six-point lead going into Sunday's final two races. In the first race on Sunday, Queen's had some difficulty and managed to finish seventh in the very tight racing while the team from the Naval Academy won the race to tie the series.

This set the stage for the final showdown. In the seventh and last race, the Queen's team broke out into an early lead only to have the Navy team capitalize on the unfamiliar strong tidal currents and come back to edge our team just before the finish line. That meant Navy won with 17 overall points, Queen's was second with 18 points and the defending champions from Santa Cruz, Calif., were third with 26 points. Surprisingly the very highly ranked team from Yale finished last. The Queen's threesome who had never sailed together before, let alone practiced in a Soling, impressed a lot of people with their smart sailing and good crew work. Coming from our Canadian winter, they were definitely against teams who were well prepared. The second place showing is the best by a Canadian school in a North American event ever.

The Queen's sailing team has captured the Canadian Dinghy Championship three years in a row, having beaten last fall thirteen other universities from across Canada, including four from the west and three from the east coast. In the last two years led by Terry McLaughlin and Doug Harvey the team has had continued success in the very tough American racing circuit, being ranked in the top ten in North America over that period of time.

Tufts University of Boston which is now ranked one has a sailing program which is comparable to our football program. Under their full time coach, the team is made up of 130 sailors of whom the best practise every day after classes. The U.S. Merchant Marine Academy at King's Point, N.Y. is not unlike a lot of other US schools in the fact that they have no less than seven sailing coaches.

VOLLEYBALL—Official games start next Tues., so be sure to check when your team plays.

That's all for now—stay tuned for next week's edition.

It is the sailing capital of the country, the Queen's team participates completely without school support. It is self-organized, self-coached, self-funded and presently by far the most successful in Canada. Even other schools in Ontario are recognized and supported by their athletic program. Other active members of the team include Mike Clew, Sue McDougall, Chris Way and Pat Roulstone, all aiming to compete in the next major regatta, the North American Intercollegiate Dinghy Championship held at the University of Rhode Island in the early spring.

Gaels drop squeaker to Gee Gees

by Rob Bruce

Tuesday night at Bartlett gymnasium, the University of Ottawa Gee Gees jumped on key Queen's mistakes to grab an exciting 75-73 win over the Gaels.

Speaking to coach Pete Smith before the game, talk quickly turned to Queen's inability to handle a fast running team. "We're just not a good running team", said Coach Smith, "yet we're playing against teams who are making us run and forcing the mistakes." Coach Smith was also concerned about the poor outside shooting of the Gaels; a fact which he considered as one of the prime reasons the Gaels have not made a good showing this year.

At first it appeared as if all Coach Smith's fears were justified, as the Gee Gees forced 6 turnovers in the first 5 minutes of play. Queen's began to settle down though, around the 8 minute mark of the first quarter when the feed to Bonniwell under the basket began to click. Along with a great defensive display, Queen's was able to take a lead which they held most of the game. Thanks to some great outside shooting of Garbaty and Cooney, plus the work of Bonniwell under the basket, Queen's emerged at the half with a 38-31 lead.

At the start of the third quarter, the Gaels seemed to sag a bit, allowing a couple of needless turnovers, compounded by some foul problems which let Ottawa come back to within three of the Gaels squad. Action again started to pick up 9 minutes into the quarter as McCready came off the bench with a hot hand to help out Garbaty and Cooney in building up a 53-45 margin.

Ottawa's big men, Davis and Eisermann, clicked all night with big shots in the second half and helped evaporate the Queen's lead. Some good hustle by Ottawa helped the Gee Gees to take a 1 point lead with 2:30 left in the game. The whole game came down to another turnover on a throw in from the Queen's baseline which was intercepted and suddenly the Ottawa lead had bulged to 75-69 with less than a minute left in the game. It cost, as the Queen's rally fell short by a single field goal.

There really were two reasons why Queen's lost the game. The first is the obvious plenitude of turnovers that are the sign either of a pressured team, or pure carelessness. The second reason was the tremendous outside shooting of the Ottawa team. There was just no way possible to stop jumpers from 20 feet out, and it seemed that all night Ottawa was able to pump them in.

It was the tremendous spirit with which the Gaels played though that really made the game. It was an outstanding effort by the basketball squad, with Henry Garbaty leading all scoring with 22 points. Cooney did an excellent job all night bringing the ball upcourt, and adding 17 points in the process. Close behind was Andy Bonniwell, who played the best game I've ever seen him play, pumping in 16 points by plain hard work under the basket.

Bonniwell [shooting] and Garbaty give solid showing in losing cause. tud

Riding goes intercollegiate

by Heather Colbert

This Saturday and Sunday three representatives from the Queen's Riding Club will compete in the Second Intercollegiate Riding Competition, held this year at Humber College. The riders, Sally Irving, Michelle Kromplak and Morgot Coulter will compete in three events—dressage, team jumping and a team relay over jumps during the two day show.

Last May the club sent a team to the First Intercollegiate Riding Competition held at Leitchcroft Farms north of Toronto. Schools represented included U of T, Western, Guelph, Seneca and Sheridan Colleges. The team members, Margo Hutton, Valerie

Lewis and Laurie McRae did extremely well both as a group and individually. Overall Queen's placed fifth out of eight teams, but it was the individual performances which were the highlights. Val Lewis placed fourth in the Finals for dressage and an overall individual second in the entire competition. Margo Hutton and Laurie McRae together won a first for Queen's in the exciting team relay over jumps. In team jumping, the three girls managed a fourth, but with better luck in drawing horses, the experienced jumping team could have easily taken first place.

The competition begins at 9 a.m. Saturday at Humber College in the indoor arena.

Fast 'n rough Commerce Cup

Mike Coumlock

Last Friday and Saturday nights the annual interfaculty hockey tournament was held at the Jock Hart Arena for the Commerce Cup. The hockey was fast and rough, a pleasant change from the mediocre performances seen in the majority of Bews regular season games. In first round action Arts defeated Law 2-1 on the strength of Peter Reid's second period goal. Meds dumped Education 5-1, Engineering, the defending champions, overpowered Commerce 4-2, and PHE hammered the Grads 5-1. Mike Cente beat PHE goalie Larry Paine on a penalty shot in this game.

Second round action saw Meds eliminate Law 3-2. John Jeffreys' third period slapshot proved to be the winner. Arts overcame an early 2-0 deficit to smash Education 6-2. Commerce trashed PHE 3-0, Frank McAuley earning the shutout and Engineering shutout the Grads 3-0 in a rough encounter. The semi-finals saw Commerce blank Arts 4-0 and Engineering toy with Meds 6-2. Meds and Arts were the two big disappointments in the tournament.

The final was a rematch of an opening round game, however the outcome was slightly different. Forman and Shirkoff gave the Engineers an early 2-0 lead which held up until early in the third period when Peter Craig of Commerce took over. He scored four third period goals and McAuley shut the Engineers out the rest of the way. Congratulations should go to Ross Fraser, the Commerce Coach, who was injured in an earlier game. Two standout performers for Commerce were Don Langill who controlled the game constantly when Commerce was killing penalties and goalie Frank McAuley who is probably the number one netminder in the League.

SPORTS SHORTS.....Commerce 79 won its first championship late in the first term sweeping the softball finals from defending champion Arts 77. Both teams played excellent defence, probably the reason they were in the final, however, a couple of costly mental errors gave 79 the title, 2-1 in extra innings and 7-3.....Commerce 77 were they not graduating could be establishing a dynasty. They hammered PHE in the finals of innertube water polo to win their second consecutive championship.

Queen's skating to championship?

by Brian Clarke

The planning and work is well under way and only the clock will tell if this year's Queen's University Figure Skating Team can win their way to another Ontario Women's Intercollegiate Athletic Association Championship.

After finishing second in the province to the University of Toronto last year, Queen's coach Nancy Brennan is hopeful that it can win back the title which it last held in 1975.

"There is no reason why we shouldn't win this year," said Mrs. Brennan. "It is the best team I have ever coached."

The 27-year-old public school teacher has coached at Queen's off and on for four years, and her team this year consists of 13 girls and three boys.

Today the skaters are getting their first test of the season, competing in London at the University of Western Ontario Invitational Figure Skating Championships. Feb. 11-12 Queen's will host the OWIAA Figure Skating Championships.

The meet today is only exhibition, but it does provide an excellent opportunity for the skaters to feel out their competition and get tuned-up for the championships at Queen's.

"We really want to win the championship, and I believe we can do it," said coach Brennan. "All the kids know each other better each year and everyone is helping."

Queen's appears to have combined a healthy mixture of enthusiasm and experience on this year's figure skating team. At try-outs for the team four boys showed up, the largest number ever, and coach Brennan has about half her skaters back from last year.

"I am really pleased," said coach Brennan. "There are no petty jealousies and the kids are working collectively, instead of individually."

Carol Fuller is the team's manager this year, which includes such duties as playing the music and, according to coach Brennan, "keeping me alive and reminding me of what has to be done."

The team's most experienced skater this season will be Vicki Cleworth, an OWIAA champion in the senior division last year.

Third year student Marilyn Snell captains this year's team. She will be doing a solo in the intermediate ladies division and also a duo with Patti Shirokoff in the senior pairs competition.

Other girls on the team this year are: Patti McLean, Sandi Blaney, Carolyn Clayton, Cathy Wild, Vicki Cleworth, Johanna Flipsen, Jan McGillivray, Julie Ringma, and Sarah Boyes.

Larry Bencze, Steve McCutcheon, and Peter Sibbald are the three boys skating for Queen's this year.

"They all could do well," said coach Brennan. "It's difficult to single anyone out as most outstanding."

The skaters practice four times a week, Monday, Tuesday, and Thursday nights, and Saturday morning at the Jock Hardy Arena.

"Lots of hard work and time goes into being good, and we're glad to have as much time as we can," said coach Brennan. "Some kids find the nights a bit awkward, especially if they live on west campus. That's the only problem."

Gilmore dies

Gary Gilmore finally received his death wish early on Monday and was executed by a firing squad at dawn. He is the first man to be legally executed in the United States for nearly a decade.

Many people feel that Gilmore's execution will start off executions of the 350 people presently on death row in American prisons.

Riots in Egypt

Two days of rioting in reaction to price increases on several essential commodities forced Egyptian President Anwar Sadat, to role back the increases. During the rioting at least six people were reported killed and 150 injured in clashes in Cairo and Alexandria. The riots caused the Government to impose a dusk-to-dawn curfew, with orders for the police to shoot anyone on the street without permission between 4 p.m. and 6 p.m.

The price rises that caused the riots concerned flour, bottled gas (for cooking), and import taxes on cars, washing machines and colour television sets. The per-capita income in Egypt is less than $200 a year. The price rises were caused by the abandonment of subsidies.

Botterell report

Dr. Botterell's recently released report on animal health for food production is causing a stir in the area. Dr. Botterell recommends that the regulations governing livestock slaughter should be reviewed and made stricter.

Dr. Allan, a local veterinarian, mentions crowded conditions at sales barns as a difficulty in properly inspecting the animals before sale, but he does emphasize that federal meat inspections, done after slaughter, are very thorough.

Dr. Osborne, a Kingston veterinarian, worries about the amount of uninspected meat which is sold. Many farmers do not think the amounts sold here are great enough to be a problem, at least in so far as Frontenac county is concerned, since it is a dairy area.

CB radio

Kingston has been lucky with CB radio-operators. Some cities, like Woodstock, Ontario, have had emergency operations, especially during unfavorable weather conditions, impeded by amateurs using necessitated by an anticipated $2.3 billion budget deficit. Sadat is trying to get $10 to $12 billion from Arab neighbours, but so far has only been offered $2 billion.

Indian election

Indira Gandhi, Prime Minister of India, announced early this week that general elections will be held, probably in March. Elections have been postponed for almost a year in India under the state of emergency imposed by Mrs. Gandhi 19 months ago. The state of emergency will be relaxed for the election to permit legitimate political activity.

Mrs. Gandhi's announcement was broadcasted shortly after the release from jail of a prominent opposition politician, former Deputy Minister Moraji Desai. As well, Lik Advani, leader of the Hindu nationalist Jana Sangh party was released. There are still a number of leading opposition politicians in jail.

Quebec probe

The Quebec Police Commission's inquiry into organized crime is now focussed upon the activities of William Obront, a 52-year-old Montreal millionaire who is serving a four year sentence for fraud. As previously, the hearings will be televised and given extreme news coverage.

Obront is accused of being the "money mover" of the Montreal underworld. He was brought back from a Costa Rican hideaway last year after authorities sought his extradition, and is currently serving four years for fraud and a year for refusing to testify before the inquiry last year.

RCMP Inspector Yves Campagna said Obront was long known in Montreal underworld circles as a banker for illegally obtained money. An OPP officer, Gaetan Bedard told the inquiry that Obront had strong links with the leadership of Montreal's Mafia. The inquiry was presented with charts of meetings and telephone conversations between Obront and such figures as Vincenzo and Santos Cotroni, Paolo Violi and Angelo Lunzo.

Jobs for blind

Last year workers from The World of One in Seven, the employment agency here in Kingston for the handicapped, were finding difficulties fitting blind people with jobs, and with the participation of some interested people a group called Innovation was formed.

This year Innovation has received a $14,000 L.I.P. grant to be used for investigating employment, education, recreation and transcription services available locally for the blind. Ten people from the televised and given extreme news coverage.

Quebec drops controls

Finance Minister Donald Macdonald criticized Quebec's action to drop the enforcement arm of its inflation control commission as "an unwise move". The move effectively removes anti-inflation controls from Quebec's public service.

Quebec's Finance Minister Jacques Parizeau said the province would uphold the wage settlements even though they violated anti-inflation guidelines as most of the settlements were reached between the workers and the previous government.

Quebec and Saskatchewan were the only provinces to set up their own anti-inflation commission to administer federal pay guides over their own public service.

Mr. Macdonald noted that the federal AIB will still operate in the private sector in Quebec, and added that the proper way for Quebec to act would have been to announce its intentions at the federal-provincial conference of finance ministers held in December.

It seems certain that the Conservative Party will join the 16 NDP MPs in signing the petition.

Killer found

The Centre for Disease Control in the United States has finally isolated the bacteria-like organism which caused the Legionnaire's Disease in Philadelphia last summer. Twenty-nine people died while 151 others recovered from the effects of the disease.

The organism was finally isolated from lung tissue of one of the victims. According to Dr. Joseph McDode, a research microbiologist, "it appears to be something we've never associated with human illness." The organism does not seem to be contagious, and it is not known yet how the victims became infected by it.

Further research into the organism and similar infections is being carried out.

Gherson withdraws, Christie unopposed

AMS exec. acclaimed

by Rob Reynolds and Terry Collins

Hugh Christie, Gord Howe and Jodi Button were acclaimed as the new AMS executive with the withdrawal of the Gles Gherson, Tom Taylor, Cathy McInerney team from the election. With the withdrawal of the Gherson team Sunday night Hugh Christie becomes AMS president, Jodi Button Vice-President (University Affairs) and Gord Howe Vice-President (Operations).

Explaining his team's reasons for pulling out of the race, former presidential candidate Gherson said, "We regret that we were unable to continue our endeavour but we felt we had to offer more than rhetoric." Gherson attributed the pull-out to a lack of time to compose a cogent policy. The would-be president remarked that, "the high ideals that we had for our administration in the nurturing of a dialogue between the student body and their administration required us to have a greater amount of knowledge than we now possess."

Although Hugh Christie stated that he was happy at attaining the presidential position he was disappointed that there was no election. Christie noted that he would try to "do everything we can to minimize the effect of the acclamation." In an effort to achieve this goal Christie pointed out that "people will know what we stand for."

In terms of direction for his administration, the new AMS president reflected upon previous administrations saying "the problem of the AMS in the past has been that they've swayed from student related issues."

The new executive outlined their general policy as follows: "The Christie team believes that in this time of financial restraint it is essential to maintain the standard of education at Queen's at the highest possible level. Therefore, in any proposals for cut-backs, student priorities must be given serious consideration."

"However, it is also recognized that there are areas within the university which are not operating at peak efficiency, and so it is incumbent upon the AMS to work in conjunction with the faculty and administration to improve the functioning of these operations."

"At the same time, the entire academic community must pose a united front to the government, and to press upon it the need for adequate post-secondary education."

Elaborates on position-

Gherson team outlines problems

As prospective candidates for the 1977-78 Alma Mater Society Executive we wish to express our sincere gratitude to those five-hundred people who afforded us the opportunity of contesting an election. We entered the race in order to provide a forum for the issues and to evoke a spirit of participation which we hoped would become a dominant theme in our administration. We felt an acclamation was not in keeping with this, our common feeling. Upon our nomination we had not reached a conclusion as to whether or not we should continue our endeavour. The impetus for our involvement is now as before, our concern for, and our feeling of responsibility towards, this university. We find ourselves unable to transform our high ideals into policies which would enable us to produce the dynamic administration we would want to lead. The aims which we held for our administration demanded a unity in philosophical outlook which we felt unable to achieve in the length of time we have before us. It is not enough to enunciate high principals without having the effective means to carry them out. Therefore, after careful consideration we honestly feel that it is incumbent upon us to withdraw our nominations.

Because we think it important that policies reflect the personality of the student body, we would suggest that student leaders attempt to formulate methods by which their arguments can be better presented before students. Through strong leadership and efficiency we had hoped to maintain and improve student services as they exist. While we recognize the importance of leadership, it must have a fundamental relevance to what students' feel.

As we have suggested our commitment lies toward inauguration of a dynamic and creative student government at Queen's. In our view this can only be achieved through the active and enthusiastic participation of a wide cross section of students in AMS and its Commissions. Fundamental to our conception for dialogue between the student body and its leaders, we would seek to promote a greater amount of student input into the quality of student services. Before investigative committees are formed, Outer Council members should educate their constituents as to the issues such that an informed response might be elicited. This would enable the AMS to formulate new and progressive policies.

In terms of current issues we are unhappy with the ambivalence displayed by students towards OFS and its professed policy of free tuition. In our view the OFS is a structure designed primarily to enunciate the aggregate policies of student governments in the province. If our student government is to be truly representative its officials should make every attempt to insure that students are cognizant of the issues and encouraged to present their stances. In our opinion most students recognize that laudible though the OFS' idea of achieving free tuition might be, and was better suited to more prosperous times. However, we would not suggest that

As a result of the university's decision to not increase its present contribution, and the Public Utilities Commission's reluctance to offer volume discount in price to Queen's students, the Bus-It transit program may be discontinued next year. Queen's students were asked whether or not they felt the program should be continued at a higher cost per student, and what they would consider to be a viable alternative or solution to the student transit problem.

Marc Brisson

"Bus-It should not be continued...I really think that it is discriminatory and elitist. The PUC should extend Bus-It to everyone in the community. Taxpayers are paying for public transit." Marc proposed several innovative solutions to the "boring atmosphere of Kingston's buses". Included were "dance floors at the back of the buses, tape decks in all buses, and washrooms." There would have to be a council, however, to rule out all disco music on the tapes. On second thought, there could be red lines for disco fans, and blue lines for underground rock."

Marc felt that everyone should have a chance to drive a bus for once in his life, and so proposed rotating bus driving schedules. Instead of paying each person the money a bus driver would normally make, the money could be credited to him... and he could ride for free."

Sallie Duggan

"Yesterday was the first time in three years that I've ridden the bus. However, a good majority of students use it, and if they're going to discontinue the system we have now, then I think a new system should be devised." Sallie, (Arts 78) felt that "students who ride the buses on a regular basis could have some sort of seasonal pass...one with special rates. If there was a seasonal rate, it would be cheaper for those students in the long run." Sallie commented that "the AMS could use the proportion of the student's fees of those who don't ride the buses toward something else; films, the Dunning series...something that would be used more than a public transit system."

The Queen's Journal Tuesday, January 25, 1977

Patty Dillon

"Bus-It should definitely be continued...but it should be continued on a voluntary basis. Since the AMS is not likely to get a volume discount, everyone should not have to pay." Patty (Arts 79) suggested having some kind of "Bus-It identification on the student cards, that way the service would be available to those who really needed it." Patty concluded her comments by saying "I really feel, however, that the Bus-It transit scheme should be extended to everyone as a Kingston city public service."

Peter McCullough

"Bus-It should not be continued at a higher cost per student because the vast majority of students live near campus and as a result, pay premium rents. Those who live off-campus should pay bus fares in lieu of higher rents." Peter (Law 79) felt that the student interest fees have "grown too large." He claimed that a feasible alternative would be the system they have at other universities. "Students can buy a pass directly from the transit system for certain bus routes." Peter commented that "as it stands right now, Kingston transit is getting a good deal since most of the students take very short rides...rides they would ordinarily never bother with if they were forced to pay for them. In this way the PUC can justify such a high price." If the AMS could not have a separate individual contract, Peter felt that "students should simply pay the same as everyone else."

CAC to get aid

by Chris Hall

An acute financial crisis has led the Consumers Association of Canada to request a donation from the Alma Mater Society.

AMS President Jamie Avis introduced a motion at last Thursday's Outer Council meeting requesting that the AMS donate 100 dollars to the CAC in order to help alleviate their financial problems. Mr. Avis told Outer Council that without the financial support of organizations like the AMS, the CAC would go bankrupt.

According to Mr. Avis, the financial problems have arisen from the CAC's refusal to accept corporate donations because they are an advocate of the consumer, not the producer.

Shuttle service could be only alternative

by Anne Johnson

In the event that Kingston's PUC does not accept the AMS's lower-cost Bus-It proposal, a shuttle bus service between main and west campus would be set up, Paul Steep, AMS

Vice President (Operations), said Sunday. Negotiations with the PUC are still in progress, and although Steep doubts his $93,000 proposal will be accepted in its entirety, he said "at least they are still listening."

Bus-It would be worth continuing only at this $93,000 cost level, said Steep, and added that "it would be irresponsible of the AMS to advise students to accept costs much higher than this."

The primary reasons for setting up Bus-It were to provide a transportation link between main and west campus and to increase the flexibility in the housing market.

"The first problem could just as easily be solved by the shuttle bus scheme," said Steep, and according to a study made by the AMS, it is doubtful whether the second function has been fulfilled. More students live closer to campus now than in 1974, so that it is doubtful whether the campus housing situation has been eased at all by the Bus-It program. In the 1975-76 period, it has been estimated that only 1.7 percent of Queen's students live far enough away from campus to require use of the bus service.

The shuttle bus service would cost no more than $50,000, added Steep, and he was hopeful that most of the cost could be borne in part by the University.

Snow trek

by Trishe Crowe

Project Green will be Project White over the weekend as it sponsors a "snow trek" to the Gould Lake Conservation Area just north of Kingston. The purpose of the trek is to encourage people to get outdoors and enjoy nature.

A bus will be leaving from in front of the Union on Sunday at 12 noon, and will return early Sunday evening around 5.30. Tickets are available in MacCorry all this week, and can also be obtained at the bus.

Cross country ski and snow shoe trails are in abundance in the conservation area and hot chocolate will be available throughout the afternoon. Experienced skiers will be present to help out beginners, and there will also be guided tours conducted.

Cross country and snow shoeing equipment is available at the Phys. Ed. Centre, but should be reserved on Friday or Saturday.

All are welcome. With the weather being as it is, a good time should be had by all.

AMS joins Greenpeace

by Tim Greenwood

The AMS has voted to become an institutional member of the Greenpeace Foundation at the cost of one hundred dollars a year.

The motion which was introduced by Hugh Christie at last Thursday night's AMS meeting was passed unanimously. Mr. Christie said that this decision arose from a meeting which the Greenpeace foundation had held on campus, which proved to be, "one of the best attended and appreciated" events at Queen's this year. He remarked that the "ideals behind the organization were particularly relevant to Canada" with the foundation's stands on such important environmental issues as whaling, sealing, the Reed Paper and mercury pollution.

AMS President Jamie Avis admitted that he knew the Greenpeace Foundation mainly for its protection of whales but he said this was enough to ensure his support for "whales are magnificent creatures, all creatures are."

If the motion passes its second reading, which it surely will, it will be official.

Campus cafeteria leaves students undernourished

by Geoff Gomery

The university is a particular target of the organizers of Canada food week, being held from Feb. 11-19 this year. "At most...institutions, the student who must rely exclusively on the campus cafeteria, residence dining hall and vending machines for his fare is poorly-nourished and economically abused," claims a publication.

"Idea kits" have been circulated to post-secondary institutions giving literature on speakers and films relevant to the week, which is designed to raise public awareness of good and economical nutrition. Special activities are suggested and information is given on how to create a food co-op also.

Publicity also urges students to mobilize against vending and catering companies when they do not provide good food at a reasonable price. Combining the efforts of many campus and community groups for the week is also suggested.

Constitutional changes won't help gov'ts' feud

by Denis Champagne

Relations between the federal and provincial governments have become antagonistic and the solution to the problem is not to be found in constitutional change, according to the leader of the federal Progressive Conservative Party, Joe Clark.

In the question period following his lecture in the annual Dunning Trust lecture series, the leader of the opposition stressed that the various jurisdictions both federal and provincial should "exercise fully the powers they presently have. We should encourage people," he continued, "to believe that the central government is beneficial to Quebecers."

Redmond leaves

by Debra Sigler

Personal reasons were cited by Mr. Redmond for his requesting a leave of absence as Chief Librarian for the 1977-78 year.

The principal's committee to investigate the library was set up at the request of Mr. Redmond, Vice-principal Love, head of the Principal's committee said that "Mr. Redmond had coped with many different problems over the eleven years period he served as Chief Librarian."

Nominations for a successor to Mr. Redmond as Chief Librarian for a five year period are being received by vice-principal Love.

On his return, Mr. Redmond will continue to work for the library in the capacity of a senior librarian.

His lecture focused on the economic difficulties of the 1970's which have provided evidence for the "more popular disaster scenarios" such as shortages of major raw materials and the problems faced by developing nations. "There may well be difficult moments on the future path to global development," he stated, "but, on balance, the economic future gives us more reasons for solid optimism than for despair."

A policy statement made earlier in the day advocating increased grants to the Canadian research community was reiterated but when asked to specify the Conservative leader declined to elaborate on the rate of increase. The capacity audience which filled Grant Hall Thursday evening applauded a statement made by one questioner implying that Mr. Clark was being too general in his answers.

The former journalist and political scientist indicated that he would be making a policy statement dealing with the Quebec separation issue in his upcoming tour of western Canada. "I do not want to place myself in a position where I will be stealing my own thunder," he said when asked about the issue.

Mr. Clark began his visit to Kingston Wednesday evening. That night he spoke informally with students at the Campus Pub. Thursday he was a guest on a local hot line show, visited with Kingstonians on Princess Street, attended a party luncheon and met with students at Queens.

Federation fight Free Chevron

WATERLOO (CUP)—The fight between the University of Waterloo Students' Council and the staff of the student newspaper it closed last September continues despite the removal from office of Council President Shane Roberts and a recent referendum which saw a 10-to-1 vote against reinstating the paper.

Staff members of the Free Chevron, the weekly they have published since the UW Federation of Students closed the Chevron September 24, have called the referendum a fraud.

Interim Federation President Dave McLellan said the Federation considers the results of the eight-question January 13 referendum binding.

The Federation is now seeking a court order to evict the Free Chevron staff from Chevron offices. If the staff refuses to leave they will be arrested, according to student councillor Doug Thompson.

In the referendum results, students voted "yes" for a Campus newspaper, approved its membership in CUP, and decided the federation, rather than a body appointed by it or a separately-elected body, should publish the paper and decide on the hiring and firing of staff, the administration of the paper's finances, and the rules by which the staff operates.

A majority felt editorial policy should be set by a body elected directly by students, and that students whose student union fees contribute to the Chevron's finances (as opposed to others who make up the campus community) should be eligible to become voting staff on the newspaper.

Free Chevron staffer Tom Cody said he is investigating the possibility the ballot boxes were stuffed, on the grounds that the turnout was only 14.5 percent, compared with a 25.6 turnout for the presidential elections, he said.

McLellan denied Free Chevron accusations that the questions were confusing and contradictory, saying there had been adequate public discussion of the issue since the Chevron's closure. He said the issue of who has the right to hire and fire newspaper staff, which according to the referendum resides with the federation, and which has been the prerogative of the Chevron staff for several years was something that was open to discussion when new by-laws governing the paper's operations are worked out.

Protest planned against fee hike

TORONTO (CUP)—Ontario student leaders have called a province-wide half day moratorium on classes for Feb. 10 to protest against recently-increased tuition fees.

The action was approved Jan. 15 at an emergency meeting of the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) at the University of Toronto. Student presidents from 13 of Ontario's 15 universities and from six community colleges voted in favor of lighting tuition hikes, announced by the provincial government in November, which would increase university fees by $100 and those at community colleges by $75.

The emergency plenary was called after a Dec. 10 meeting with the minister of colleges and universities Harry Parrott, who told the student representatives the government's stand was inflexible despite the presentation of a 25,000 signature petition against the hikes.

Some of the delegates were reluctant to endorse the campaign which includes mass student meetings, soliciting support from labor, community and church groups plus letter-writing campaigns to politicians and newspapers.

Hugh Christie, Queen's student vice-president and OFS executive member said the community campaign would succeed.

"It's blatantly obvious—the poor support the universities with their tax dollars and they're not allowed in," he said.

If the campaign is successful student leaders hope to lobby the provincial legislature and have an effect on the next provincial election.

Declining demand for student aid

WINNIPEG (CUP)—Many students do not apply for student aid because they want to avoid "substantial debts" according to a report prepared by the Manitoba Student Aid Office.

But this does not deter most from continuing as full-time students the report concluded.

Leaked anonymously to the University of Manitoba student newspaper, the Manitoban, the report was commissioned to discover why student aid applications dropped 12.4 percent this year despite a marginal university enrollment increase.

The study was based on 88 replies to an October questionnaire sent to 235 students eligible for aid but who had not applied.

Of full-time students, 36 percent said they didn't apply because they didn't want to take out more loans.

Another 24 percent said they had enough resources of their own, while 20 percent said they didn't think they were eligible this year. From this, the report concluded that a "significant number of students appear to have greater resources available" to finance their education, and suggested this may be related to a summer savings increase.

Australian perspective

Developing resources

The political and economic nature of natural resource development in Australia will be the topic of an upcoming seminar delivered by Dr. Michael Crommelin, a Senior lecture in law at the University of Melbourne. Dr. Crommelin will review the constitutional framework in which State and Commonwealth governments share control over mineral and energy resources, both within and off the coast of Australia. He will also examine policy initiatives made by Commonwealth authorities, such as price and export controls, treatment of offshore jurisdictional disputes, and the establishment of Crown Corporations, in the area of resource management. In addition Dr. Crommelin will discuss the present balance between State regulation of exploration and production, and Commonwealth control of pricing and exports. Dr. Crommelin will also speculate on the potential of future conflict which may arise from jurisdictional disputes, taxation, and environmental concerns.

The seminar, titled "Recent Developments in Minerals and Energy Policy in Australia. The Constitutional, Political and Economic Issues", will be presented in the conference Room, Dunning Hall (second floor) on Tuesday February 1, at 3:30 p.m. Dr. Crommelin will visit Queen's as a guest of the Centre for Resource Studies, which is concerned with both the physical and social issues of natural resource development.

by Chris Hall and Tim Greenwood

Queen's students will be asked to join the National Union of Students (NUS) on a referendum to be conducted February 9. The referendum is the result of a motion introduced by External Affairs Commissioner Hugh Christie at an AMS Outer Council meeting last Thursday night.

Repeating the phrase "NUS is us", Mr. Christie led the Council's support for joining the NUS among Outer Council members. He claimed that NUS had previously proven its usefulness on other university campuses and that it provided indispensable aid to the organizers of National Students Day at Queen's.

Mr. Christie stated that NUS had proven that "students talking to students across the country does not have to be a left-wing thing."

AMS President Jamie Avis also spoke in favour of Queen's participation in NUS, noting particularly

students have relinquished their long term desire that all financial for those with appropriate academic qualifications be removed.

An upcoming issue of widespread concern is our proposed par-making body.

We are disappointed with Outer Council's recent desire to express its displeasure to Dr. Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, concerning the increase in tuition fees for 1977-1978. After four years of fixed tuition fees, students must accept some responsibility for offsetting the rising costs of providing post-secondary education. However, increased tuition fees should not be used to relieve the provincial government of its financial commitments to universities. Any increase in tuition fees should be accompanied by a further financial commitment on the part of the Ontario government. Moreover, any rise in tuition fees should be accompanied by an exposition of the government's system of priorities with regard to social services. This would enable students to formulate their own position with a full understanding of the government's financial objectives.

Chris McNally, President of the Engineering Society, expressed doubts as to Queen's need to join the NUS when the services might duplicate those of the OFS. He felt that by joining NUS, Queen's would only add to the existing bureaucracy surrounding student's interests as they were dealt with at Queen's.

NUS is a research-oriented organization consisting of thirty-three individual student associations at the post-secondary level. National student issues such as student unemployment, housing, immigration, and escalating tuition fees are investigated and the material gathered is made available to all members.

NUS also provides a communication network for students in all Canadian universities. Workshops and conferences are set up for student council members in order to expand their knowledge of the issues and so they may have contact with their counterparts from universities in other regions of Canada.

participation in the National Union of Students (NUS). We believe our representation at the national level is important. However, we would emphasize that our membership in NUS should be consistent with our position with regards to OFS. In other words, it should not be a policy making body.

We are disappointed with Outer Council's recent desire to express its displeasure to Dr. Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, concerning the increase in tuition fees for 1977-1978. After four years of fixed tuition fees, students must accept some responsibility for offsetting the rising costs of providing post-secondary education. This would enable students to formulate their own position with a full understanding of the government's financial objectives.

The student housing within Kingston is also a relevant and topical concern. To deal with the landlords, student tenant associations should be further developed from their inception last year into a unified force to combat rent hikes and poor living conditions.

In keeping with the essence of this statement we will attempt to promote discussion on relevant issues in the forthcoming year. We wish the incoming executive a successful administration.

NUS reps make pitch

That the National Union of Students (NUS) has a lot to offer Queen's was the opinion of one NUS representative who was interviewed by the Journal last Thursday night.

When asked how NUS membership would benefit Queen's specifically, Gavin Anderson, NUS rep said that it "was safe to say" that the summer employment program, YOUNG CANADA WORKS, that the NUS had successfully lobbied the federal government for would provide close to one hundred jobs for students in the Kingston area. Mr. Anderson said that student employment was the top priority of the NUS and that if Queen's were to join they would have more input into the kind of job programs NUS works towards.

In response to the contention that the NUS would duplicate the services of the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) of which Queen's is presently a member, Gavin Anderson claimed that there was "a complementary overlap" of the services which each organization provides. The NUS he said, covers a broader area than the OFS, doing specific research into such student related matters as tuition increases, regional disparity, and dealing with Manpower and Immigration, Statistics Canada, and the Secretary of State with regard to student unemployment. Mr. Anderson emphasized the importance of the NUS and its communication with the federal government in a year in which the Fiscal Arrangements Act was deciding how much of its 1.6 billion dollar budget would be allocated for post-secondary education.

Gavin Anderson when questioned as to where the money from the membership fees went, answered that about half goes toward the salaries of the eight staff members. They are responsible for the research and writing of NUS material. The other half goes toward travel expenses.

Learn speaking basics for style

Even though you may speak to groups of people frequently, you may not have realized there are subtle ways to enhance or obscure a message. For example, if you are very nervous while giving a seminar or speech, you might give your audience a number of verbal and non-verbal cues which draw attention to your anxiety and detract from the content of the delivery. Fortunately, you can learn how to use these cues to your advantage.

Chris Wuerschler, a graduate student in clinical psychology, has developed a speaking skills program in which students learn to express themselves more effectively. "The goal of the program," says Chris, "is to teach individuals the fundamental skills necessary for good public speaking so that they can then go on to develop their own unique speaking styles."

If you find that your own ability to speak in front of a class or small group is hampered because you are nervous or because you are not really sure what to do, you might consider signing up for this program. Leave your name and telephone number with Ms. Nadine Merrill in the main office of the Psychology Department (547-2697), or call Chris at home after 6pm (546-0331). Since this course will start in the first week of February, you are encouraged to enroll as soon as possible.

Northern development committee

'On the map' at Queen's

by Paul Finkel

Efforts have commenced at Queen's to develop "an interdisciplinary committee for research, training and teaching within the general area of northern development."

Citing the north as a place of "tremendous intellectual resources", Chairman Dr. C. Hodge (Director, School of Urban and Regional Planning) explained that the committee is only in a "very formative stage", working "to get the proposal off the ground and evaluate other aspects of operations that can be pursued."

The five member committee is primarily a co-ordinating body striving to "pull together several obvious interests that exist at Queen's for northern studies." The group plans to invite people from other parts of the campus to their next meeting to discuss aspects of research training and other operations in the north.

It is further hoped that the present group will form the nucleus of a large interdisciplinary committee which will incorporate people already working in or desiring to work in northern Canada and further, to represent Queen's "on a tentative basis" in the National Association of Universities for Northern Studies.

Queen's has already been designated as a co-host for the next association meeting in Churchill, Manitoba this spring and will send Dr. F. Cooke (Biology).

The committee is also investigating various sources of funding and is presently awaiting a reply from the Dept. of Indian and Northern Affairs on a grant application. If DINA approves the request, the money will mainly be used for the establishment of research assistantships (including four or five for graduate students), graduate fellowships and some research activities.

The committee plans to equip people for work in the north and fund people who might eventually be made a job offer by DINA.

The Law and Medical Faculties have already expressed a desire to assist in the operations of the Northern Studies group and Dr. Hodge is confident that the members of the Psychology, Sociology and Geography Departments will also become involved in the project.

Ms. Greer lectures here

Germaine Greer, prominent in the feminist movement since the success of her book, The Female Eunuch, in 1970, will give a lecture, Tuesday, Feb. 1 at 8 p.m. in Grant Hall, Queen's University.

Ms. Greer's lecture, entitled Feminism and Fertility, will be a discussion of social issues relating to women such as abortion and birth control.

Widely publicized for her outspoken and controversial opinions on women, Ms. Greer, 38, argues in her bestselling book, The Female Eunuch, that society has symbolically castrated women by foisting on them a passive, insipid and feminine role that must be rejected to regain their sexuality and natural energies. Women, she maintains, must reject this female stereotype and in effect stop peering at the world through false eyelashes.

The Australian-born writer studied English at the University of Melbourne and the University of Sydney before winning a Commonwealth Scholarship which enabled her to attend Cambridge University, in England, where she earned her PhD. In 1967 she began teaching at the University of Warwick, near London.

While lecturing at Warwick on traditional Elizabethan drama, she dabbled in acting on a daffy television show and wrote articles for Listener, The Spectator and some underground journals. Since 1970 she has been at the forefront of the international feminist movement.

Candidates

Candidates for all AMS and faculty society elections should submit their campaign statements NO LATER THAN 5 P.M., MONDAY, JANUARY 31.

Statements must be typed (set typewriter margins for 75 spaces) and will not be accepted if they exceed 20 lines. Please staple separate sheets together and ensure that your name and the position you are running for is typed at the top.

Photographs will be taken in the Tricolor office on the 29th and 30th of January. Times to be announced - watch Friday's Journal.

The Journal-Tricolor offices are located in the basement of the John Deutsch University Centre (the old Student's Memorial Union) and are accessible only through the International Centre Lounge on the main floor. Just follow the signs.

Statements will not be accepted after Monday, January 31, 5 p.m.

Acclamation. Again.

acclaim, v.t. Applaud loudly or enthusiastically; (w. obj. & compl.), hail as (king, winner, saviour; -ed him king).
acclamation, n. Loud & eager assent to a proposal [voted, carried by acclamation]; shouting in a person's honour (usu. pl.).
- The Concise Oxford Dictionary

Excuse us for not shouting in honour of the new AMS executive right away. We don't know what they stand for yet.

The last time the AMS faced an Executive acclamation was in 1975 when John Gray, Ian Nordheimer and John Wilson took office with no competition. At that time Gray's team was considered very strong. Strong enough, in fact, to prompt speculation that prospective teams were intimidated.

This year's acclamation came about when the team of Giles Gheron, Tom Taylor and Cathy McInerney withdrew their candidacy, thereby opening the way for Hugh Christie, Gord Howe and Jodi Button to take office unopposed.

The Gheron team was formed twenty-four hours prior to the deadline for nominations. They had leadership qualities, a sound understanding of student issues, and a fair amount of experience. Gheron has worked as a reporter, news editor, and Queen's Journal editorialist for two years. Taylor organized 1974's Engineering Orientation and worked through the AMS Constable system to Chief Constable. McInerney has worked with the AMS Internal Affairs Commission in a variety of capacities from constable to editor of the AMS page in the Journal.

Time did not allow for reconciliation of differing views within the infant slate nor for the critical preparations necessary to run a comprehensive campaign. Thus, the team dissolved last Sunday night making Christie the uncontested President of the Society.

Christie is presently AMS External Affairs Commissioner and an executive member of the Ontario Federation of Students. His Vice-President (University Affairs) is Jodi Button, a third year student who has worked in several capacities with the AMS. Gord Howe is this year's Speaker of AMS Outer Council and has never played hockey in his life. He takes over as Vice-President (Operations).

students should have a say

We feel strongly that students should have some say in who their most senior representatives will be next year, despite the absence of choice. Mr. Christie shares our concern that his team will have no mandate to take to Outer Council. They will not have their objectives clearly defined and endorsed by the Society's membership. Nor will they have the needed authority to speak for students as the executive of the AMS.

The AMS Constitution is not equipped to deal with the problem of acclamation—the possibility hardly known or thought of when the AMS Constitution was rewritten in the late sixties. There was an acclaimed team in 1968 which postponed the nominations deadline for a week. Other teams entered the race. This is an inadequate approach to the problem as unprepared candidates rush to assemble policy positions and platforms they barely have time to consider while running with other individuals they might hardly even know.

We would put forward an alternative proposal:

With the consent of the Christie team, a yes or no question should be placed on the AMS election ballot. Christie, Howe and Button should go through the standard interviews with the Queen's Journal and should have the opportunity of communicating in depth their objectives and views on student issues. These would determine the verdict.

Hopefully it would not happen, but if the students chose not to accept the only declared candidates for the positions, the AMS Outer Council could provide an interim Executive until an election could be held shortly after reading week.

With any other positions we would not advocate a departure from Canadian political tradition. We think the highest official offices in the AMS organization deserve unique consideration.

That the AMS should encounter its third acclamation in a decade is a sad commentary on the degree of student interest in AMS affairs. It would be more unfortunate though, if Mr. Christie became a lame President because he did not win a mandate from his student constituents.

Did standards go out with departmentals?

by Nancy Bowes

by Nancy Bowes

Since the demise of the departmentals, the education system has been roundly denounced at all levels for being too easy and too soft. Its products are taunted with charges of being illiterate and of having meaningless degrees.

The Interface Report released a week ago confirmed the feelings that many people have had for a number of years. Among other findings, the report stated that there has been a general rise in marks in Grade 13 and that the rise does not signify greater academic excellence. In addition to inflation in high school marks, there has been inflation in university marks. There is almost no co-ordination of course content between high schools and universities.

When the decision was made to abandon the departmentals, the decisionmakers chose, in effect, to live in the tension of a position between the arbitrariness of departmentals and free-for-all of no graduation or admission standards whatsoever.

Absolute numbers forbid the idea of conducting personal interviews with each Grade 13 graduate who wishes to come to university. Even such an interview could not guarantee that only those truly interested in learning would enter post-secondary institutions.

Is a mechanism to separate the willing and able from the uninterested and unable necessary? Most assuredly, yes. With limited resources, post-secondary institutions cannot afford to entertain those who only diminish the quality of education. Some standard, whether it be tests, Grade 13 marks or something yet untried, must be applied to the high school graduates who wish to enter university.

Our best hope may be that with a return to core courses in the curricula of schools, as promised by Education Minister Thomas Wells, the level of ability of high school graduates will rise and allow the post-secondary institutions to teach at the post-secondary level.

A Voice from the Cloister—Carol Town

Bus-it: not just a business deal

To have Bus-it or not to have Bus-it, that (once again) is the question! Unfortunately, for many students who have watched this annual debate three or four times, especially those who rarely use the Kingston bus service, these issues have become stale and repetitive. But this year's debate is especially important for there is a good chance that if Paul Steep's policy is implemented, the service will be discontinued. The students must decide whether he is making the right decision and, in order to do this, we must reconsider the main issues.

optional service available to those who want it is a good one but it is questionable whether the city will subsidize student rides.

Finally, is the shuttle service a viable alternative? Of the twenty percent of Queen's students who do not live within walking distance of the university, what percentage live at West Campus? A shuttle service would only be useful to those students. Further, how many of those are Education students who use Kingston transit while practice teaching? A shuttle service would help them. Also, would the service be as frequent or more frequent than the Kingston bus service? These are all questions which we must consider before immediately declaring that yes, we should discontinue Bus-it and implement a shuttle service. This is more than just a business deal and should be treated as such.

Jonathan R.

Yes! to NUS

James Avis, AMS president

The primary question is whether two thousand students who do not live within walking distance of the university should be subsidized by those who do. The only reason why subsidization should not occur is that next year each Queen's student would pay $8.15 for something he might never use. However, the general and long-term benefits of Bus-it are much greater than the actual cost to each individual. For example, it helps to alleviate the housing shortage which continues to become more severe as each year passes. If a student must pay fifteen to twenty-five dollars per week in bus fare, as well as put up with the loss of time, he will surely try harder to find accommodation close to Queens. Yet, students should be encouraged to live away from the University not only because it will keep prices down but because the competition for housing which is close to Campus perpetuates a student ghetto. The Bus-it service helps Queen's and the residential area surrounding to remain a homogenous part of the Kingston community.

Another question which is central to the Bus-it debate is whether the PUC is charging an unreasonable rate. Their assessment of 362,970 rides seems legitimate for that gives twenty percent of Queen's students two rides per school day for fifteen weeks. Why should we expect a large discount? Cam Watts' suggestion (Journal, Friday, January 21, 1977) that perhaps Bus-it should be an

This year's A.M.S. executive elections and referenda have been set for February 10. So far, the only question which has been placed on the referendum asks students whether they want to join the National Union of Students (N.U.S.) The A.M.S. executive and Outer Council urge all students to vote a resounding "YES" to this question. In this and subsequent columns I will show why we should join N.U.S.

One of the first questions students ask when presented with the idea of a national student organization is: "Why do we need a political organization that is national in scope when post-secondary education is a provincial concern?" I hope to show in this column how the federal government is directly involved in education and also in other areas of vital interest to students. It will follow that a national lobby group to keep government informed of student concerns is a valuable asset to us all.

It is well-known that the federal government makes massive infusions of funds into provincial post-secondary systems through transfer payments under the Fiscal Arrangements Act. Throughout recent federal-provincial negotiations concerning renewal of this play, the National Union of Students played an active role in keeping abreast of developments and relaying information to campuses. It also joined with other sectors of the university community in applying pressure to minimize cutbacks in the federal contribution. Indirect federal involvement through the FAA is a matter of continuing concern to students, since without it, it is by no means certain that the provinces could support the existing university system.

The federal government spends millions of dollars annually in direct research funding through the Canada Council, the National Research Council, and the Medical Research Council. Still, the total public contribution to research in Canada is grossly inadequate. Canada has virtually the lowest per capita level of research funding of the industrialized nations.

The lack of a coherent policy to support research can be disastrous for Canadian universities. We rely on research projects at universities to attract top faculty and graduate students. Without federal funding, the appropriate climate for creativity in research cannot be created. Every student suffers if the university cannot maintain a dynamic research sector. Moreover, university research can be a catalyst in attracting private capital for research and development to Canada. The development of a private research community would ensure jobs for graduates which would make use of their expensive training. The N.U.S. will join faculty associations and university administrations in calling on the federal government to meet its responsibilities in this area.

Yet another area within the federal jurisdiction that is of concern to many students is income taxation. Did you know that although tuition fees are deductible from income for tax purposes, student interest fees are not? The student interest fee is a compulsory fee, and it is approaching $100 at Queen's. We suggest that this fee forms a significant part of the cost of attending university and ought to be treated in the same way as tuition fees.

And did you know that although working parents can deduct child care expenses from their income for tax purposes, students who must pay for child care while they attend classes cannot? This oversight in the tax law causes difficulties for many older students in graduate schools and continuing education programs. It should be corrected. The N.U.S. can assist us in bringing these tax anomalies to the attention of the government.

Students are also interested in human rights, criminal law and consumer protection. Legislation in all these areas is enacted from time to time by the federal government. Every other interest group in the country has a lobbying force at the federal level. Students must enter the arena, or see their interests forced aside by more vocal sectors of the population. N.U.S. can and does provide this type of interface to government in a responsible way. It is about time the A.M.S. joined up.

CUP conference as seen by a delegate

by Rob Reynolds

There have been a number of impassioned pleas made to the Journal from external bodies to leave the Canadian University Press (CUP). These requests would seem to come in light of the business conducted at the CUP 39 conference held in Vancouver over the Christmas holidays. As a delegate to that conference from the Journal I feel some clarification is in order as to the proceedings at that conference and as to the role of CUP.

While it is true that we, the representatives of the Journal met with opposition in our attempts to halt the expansion of CUP and to depoliticize the co-operative, we did, however, have sympathetic ears. The vast majority of papers in ORCUP (Ontario Region CUP) shared ideas very similar to ours. Indeed it was in conjunction with one other Ontario paper, the UWO Gazette, that we constructed an alternative to the present Statement of Principles for the CUP News Service. Our support was not, however, limited to Ontario papers. One strong ally, from across the country was the University of Victoria Martlet. In addition, certain Prairie newspapers shared a viewpoint similar to ours.

In short, we were not operating in splendid isolation in trying to achieve our goals but had strong support from roughly one-third of the newspapers represented.

The final plenary session proceeded with the report of the Service Commission, a body charged with bringing recommendations forward as to the nature and scope of expansion. One of the essential cornerstones of the expansion program was the implementation of telex at various levels of the organization. When it came time for voting on increased use of telex the motion was defeated as was a motion dealing with limiting the twice weekly news service mail-out to a weekly service. Having defeated these two major steps in the expansion program the new national executive moved to suspend the agenda and consider the direction of CUP. This was done and it was revealed that no apparent consensus existed among papers as to the direction or purpose of CUP. At that point it was decided to convene a CUP 39½ conference to be held in March to re-consider expansion. In the immortal words of Casey Stengel, "Sometimes you gotta take a rain-out as a win."

One important function of CUP, ignored by Jamie Avis in his letter in the January 18 edition of the Journal, is that the organization is a co-operative concerned with maintaining the freedom of the student press in Canada. CUP exists to make certain that student governments do not impose upon the editorial autonomy of member papers. It is with this intention of perpetuating freedom of the press that the organization maintains its Statement of Principles. (note: we wanted to abolish the Statement of Principles for the News Service—two different documents.) At Queen's it is all too easy to say that we don't need an external body to insure the autonomy of the Journal as in the past the AMS has helped more than hindered the paper in developing a strong editorial policy. The possibility does, nonetheless, exist that the AMS, as publishers of the Journal, could decide to stop the paper from publishing. Although we do have financial autonomy, the possibility of the AMS closing down the paper exists, albeit highly unlikely. At other member papers the possibility of being shut-down is not so unimaginable as is evidenced by the situation at the University of Waterloo where the campus newspaper, the Chevron was closed down by the Student's Federation.

With this plausibility in mind, one must be somewhat skeptical of a student president and student government pushing for its newspaper to leave the co-operative CUP. The suggestion seems ironic in light of the fact that the same president is encouraging students to join a national student association namely the National Union of Students (NUS).

In summary, it is my belief that the Journal can have more impact upon the direction of the student press in Canada by remaining in CUP than by leaving the organization. We must also remember that the co-operative is just that and exists to insure that student government's do not try to impose editorial control upon campus newspapers. In short CUP exists to maintain freedom of the student press in this country.

Reader defends CUP. . .

"If not objective, at least honest"

Dear Editor:

The Journal of January 13, 1977 contained an editorial entitled "For Objective News" in which the Journal voiced its opposition to the recent decision of the Canadian University Press (CUP) to adopt a new statement of principles.

In the next Journal an article by Jamie Avis expressed the opinion that "a priori guidelines for editorial opinion by CUP is clearly abusing the privileged position of the free press" and that such action amounts to "a conspiracy on the part of those who control the means of information dissemination to force a particular ideology on a captive audience." I agree with Mr. Avis and the Journal that one of the "highest institutional ideals" of any society is the maintenance of "a free press dedicated to objective news coverage" and I commend those who have brought the issues of "ideology" and "propaganda" in the press to our attention.

However, I contend that the dissemination of propaganda and ideology is not exclusively reserved for those with 'leftist' political views. The "conventional wisdom" holds that virtually everyone in Canada has an equal opportunity in a largely middle class if not classless society. Such "wisdom" carefully and cruelly ignores the existence in Canada of a considerable degree of institutionalized inequality of condition and opportunity and, as such, constitutes little more than blatant propaganda.

In a liberal democracy, lack of formal governmental control over the press is regarded as evidence of the existence of freedom of the press. This belief is further strengthened by the fact that the press in such societies is often critical of government and private actions which prejudice the 'public interest'. The press, therefore, achieves status as a 'watchdog' in public affairs. Recent literature suggests that in an age of corporate capitalism such a view is somewhat simplistic.

Data reported by Wallace Clement in The Canadian Corporate Elite, for example, suggests that those who control the dominant media complexes in Canada are "in large part, a subset of the (Canadian) economic elite" and increasingly becoming more so. As such, Clement argues, the media is consciously manipulated as an ideological tool to perpetuate the status quo and preserve the privileged position of the Canadian corporate elite. The extent to which such a conclusion is warranted is open to debate, however, the paucity of radical content in all the major, established Canadian newspapers does tend to suggest that there is a process by which those who own the major media complexes 'select' not only what news is to be reported but also the way in which that news is reported. As such, claims that the news is reported 'objectively' must be re-examined. Newspapers are, therefore, subject to the influence of the dominant social and economic ideology.

Rather than claim some sort of false and obscure "objectivity" in a fashion similar to most Canadian news services, the CUP has decided to make its editorial policy explicit. It is not objective but, and this is important, it makes no such claim. It is at least honest. Whether one agrees or disagrees with the 'radical' intent of the statement of principles one must congratulate them for their editorial honesty and their attempt to mobilize resistance to inequalities existing in Canadian society. It is, I agree, a sad state of affairs when, to mobilize support for basic human dignity and equality, the CUP must undergo the just criticism that it has aborted the principle of freedom of the press. By the same token, however, it is encouraging to see that CUP has chosen to attempt a meaningful editorial alternative to the 'objective', system-stabilizing, liberal editorial policies of major Canadian news services.

JOE

by Terry Collins, Giles Gherson, transcribed by Tony Pepper

I remember one of the first newspaper interviews I ever did, I had a summer job with the Edmonton Journal, and they used to send me around to conduct interviews that nobody else wanted to, and they sent me to deal with the head of government of... I now forget which country it was, it was a small country, and I literally had not heard of the country before. It wasn't the head of government but the foreign minister who was in Edmonton for unknown reasons, and I didn't get any briefing. I didn't know you would get any, and I went over and sat down, and it was the most excruciatingly difficult half-hour of my life because it didn't have any base. You couldn't talk about the weather.

Journal: Mr. Clark, how can the Government of Canada develop a national identity to which Quebec can relate?

Clark: Well, first of all, the national government can't do it, period. We well might have been making a serious mistake in the nature of our pursuit of national identity over the last ten or fifteen years. I say this tentatively. It is an hypothesis that I'm asking some of the people who are working with me to examine. You see we've been very conscious; we've been more conscious of the United States in the past two decades than I think we have been at any previous time since the War of 1812. And to a large degree there was an attempt to define ourselves by contrast with the United States.

It's arguable that prior to that time, prior to that self-consciousness about identity, we were getting along quite well with some quite strong local identity. There's no question that in my part of the country, in the foothills of south-western Alberta, there was a fairly strong sense of who people were, what they were about. I think this was the case in Metro (Toronto). I think it was the case in Newfoundland. Certainly it was the case in Quebec.

And indeed it produces a lot of our literature. You know I lived down the street, as a youth, from Bill Mitchell, whose book Who Has Seen the Wind is still the sort of classic perception by a westerner of that very peculiar locale, and locale is an important word. I've thought for some time that we've been lusting after an eagle or a bull dog or some other simple symbol of the whole Canadian nation. Our country has never really been that simple.

And I rather gather as I talk, for example, to new Canadians who come here, who might have had the option of going to Detroit instead of coming to Toronto or some place, that there is a greater sense of a capacity to maintain in Canada a lively transported culture than there is if they moved into the United States. I'm not sure about that, and there have been some studies on it that I want to take a look at, but the idea is interesting. I want to see where that takes us. We are fundamentally different from the United States in that their history has involved, in effect, a rejection of, principally Europe, it became broader than that, but a rejection of old traditions, and the development, quite consciously, of a new society in a new continent.

Our tradition was very different. It was the bringing of traditional cultures to a new continent, and the modification of those traditional cultures by the imperatives of the continent. That's why they played polo in High River, which they did, and that's what they had when my grandmother was alive... I know that some of them are still alive... they're drawing near death now, they're in their nineties. But I know one quite remarkable woman who used to; her husband was arthritic, so she used to run the ranch in the day, and every fourth Friday night she would have a costume or fancy dress dinner at their ranch house that other people would come into. That created a sense of standards in south-western Alberta that is quite strong, quite different from anything you'd find in Colorado, or in places where the purpose was to obliterate a part culture.

We didn't obliterate it; we adopted it. I think that it is in the recognition that we have a distinctive identity because of an attempt to incorporate traditional cultures into different locales that we are, first of all, different from the United States as a continental societies; but secondly (and when I say 'continental', which is a loaded word, I'm not meaning north-south: the continent in my judgement runs east-west), secondly, I think... it emphasizes our own differences of locale, first of all because different kinds of people came to different parts of the country, it happened to primarily be the Anglo-Saxons who came to my part of the country; primarily the Irish who came to Newfoundland, and left an unmistakable imprint there; primarily there were a number of Ukrainian Canadians who came to northern parts of my constituency where the society is markedly different from what it is in the Anglo-Saxon section. - You grow up looking a different kind of church for one thing.

There are different traditions. I'd never run into haggling before I went into some of the northern parts of my constituency because haggling is very much not part of the Anglo-Saxon tradition. It is part of the Ukrainian culture; and the first price offered for an automobile in Vegreville or Wildwood in my constituency is just the start of the bargaining. In High River that's the final offer. Those changes I think are very important to the identity of the country.

What I would like to see is us pursue a national cultural policy which governments can encourage and set frameworks for, but which individual people and communities and exceptional people like artists are going to have to define. That's the state of my thinking. Now that general approach runs into the same hard questions we run into on other matters when we deal with cable, T.V., and what do you do about commercial deletions. All of these things... I don't have hard answers to those hard questions. But my disposition at the moment is to say that we've been making a mistake in terms of our attempt to define Canadian identity by ignoring our locales. One of these locales, the most evident that we've perhaps ignored, has been the Quebec locale. I personally think this would be a fairly minor outcome of the Confederation question. But I think that if there were a sense of ease in Quebec; that there was not going to be an attempt to impose upon Quebec some "Canadian" culture manufactured in Toronto - and they, like High River, like Newfoundland, were going to be able to maintain what was theirs; that some of the cultural unquiet in Quebec might diminish. In cultural terms there's no question that the most lively part of Canada in the last decade has been the province of Quebec.

An interview with the Hon. Joe Clark

Journal: Sir, you seem to favour decentralization to a considerable extent. I was wondering whether you think the recent fiscal relations negotiations which have taken place recently will result in wide disparity in the standards of social services offered across Canada?

Clark: No, I don't think they will. I think that agreement was hopeful because it reversed a trend that had been developing over the last ten or fifteen years of the imposition of Ottawa priorities on various provinces. My view of the country, my view of the federal system, is that first of all we created it for a purpose. A unitary system wouldn't have worked here. We created it in response to the recognition that the government in the parts have a better idea about what their parts need than central governments do. I think that the greatest danger in terms of creating regional economic disparity would result from the kind of thing we had earlier this year when the Federal Government had forced all the provinces into the same kind of Medical Care program and had then pulled back. Well, that is causing discomfort in Ontario, serious discomfort. But it is causing very real crisis in New Brunswick where there are not just other means to achieve levels of service that may not be applicable there.

I want to look seriously at the practical affects I hope it can be an unprejudiced examination of the universal application of standards across the country. There is a little town in my constituency that needed a jail. They are served by the R.C.M. Police establishment. Well, in the town of For Creek, the most prestigious largest building there is the police barrack because they had to, in order to get federal assistance, conform to federal standards. It is too big. It would have made more sense to have cut the standards to suit the circumstances. It may be that northern New Brunswick, had there been a greater latitude in how health dollars were spent, there would have been a different kind of health development than was the case in Ontario. But it would have been more suitable.

Now, having been forced to adhere to certain standards, and having had the money pulled away, New Brunswick has the problem of having one set of standards that were perhaps too excessive, too strong in the parts that have been built up, and none elsewhere. So the places where they had not begun building yet are not going to be satisfied with what suits them. They are going to demand what is equal to another place. If you see the point I am making. I think that can cause fairly serious disparities. Our programs of equalization payments, I think, providing there are not too many strings attached, can provide pretty good guarantee against that kind of problem.

We are looking with a great deal of sympathy towards programs that impact regionally - unemployment insurance is a good example. It is wrong in two ways: One it does not really help areas where there are serious unemployment problems it's a carry over. Secondly, it invites abuse in areas such as my part of the country.

I am sure it would make sense to most Albertans to have, per capita, more money spent on job creation in Newfoundland than is spent per capita in Alberta; we are going to seriously consider mixing that kind of Federal emphasis with equalization payments that help provinces with special problems.

Journal: Sir, some people are concerned with post-secondary education, and they feel as a result of the recent negotiations, perhaps there will be a wide disparity in the standard of university courses offered across Canada; and that in the poorer provinces, universities will decline in terms of their standards because provincial governments will tend to put their money in what they see to be more viable projects, such as roads, or the creation of jobs in other areas. Do you think that's a wide problem?

Clark: Well, it may be. My reaction would be to let that be corrected by provincial governments, provincial elements. If a province is pursuing priorities that the people don't want, the people have a means to change that, and if the people of New Brunswick or Nova Scotia decide they want better roads instead of another building at U.N.B., I think that's the kind of decision their provincial government should be making, and should be responsible for, should be accountable for. We cannot base everything on achieving national standards everywhere.

Journal: So in other words, the Rowell-Sirois Report type of argument might have been a little bit ambitious perhaps?

Clark: Well, the Rowell-Sirois Report type of argument was made thirty years ago. One of the things we have got to consider pretty seriously, I think, is that it might well be time, and very appropriate for another (Report) to look at the circumstances in a very different country we have now.

Journal: Do you favour the legalization of marijuana?

Clark: Of possession, yes. I have some worries about trafficking and I am just not current with how the term trafficking is being applied in the courts. I wouldn't want to have a criminal record attached to somebody who occasionally supplied marijuana to a room-mate. That I don't think is trafficking, and the court definitions of trafficking might suggest that it is. But I would not have criminal records attached.

Journal: How substantial a review are you planning to inaugurate on wage and price controls?

Clark: Well, a quite substantial review. We intend to force the government to justify the program, and explain how long it intends to continue this program with what modifications. We hope to be in a position to spell out some alternatives they should consider. The program was supposed to be temporary. There's now some evidence that it might become permanent. No government should be allowed to slip into that. So we at the very least will force a debate that will cause them to come clean as to their own plans. We hope, I hope that my party will be in a position to make some contributions and suggestions as to what should be done differently. Opposition parties always face a limitations of resources. You know I don't have a public service working for me. But we're going to deal with that the best we can.

Journal: Why does Mr. Wagner feel he has too little influence in the party?

Clark: I really don't know that. I don't know why he does, if he does. I think when there is a problem like that it should be discussed personally between the two of us, and I have not been anxious to make any further comment till I know precisely what concerns him, if indeed the whole thrust of what he was saying wasn't misinterpreted, which it might have been I'm not saying it was

He's a member of a committee of fifteen people, a strategy committee that meets quite regularly to discuss the course of the party, and is probably the single most influential agency in the party. He's the chairman of one of the two or three most prestigious committees within our caucus and has access to all of my colleagues, to me and to our policy procedures whenever he wants to exercise it. It may be that the problem relates to a different view of how we approach the province of Quebec. My view as I articulated it as a candidate for the leadership, is that we can no longer rely upon making alliances with other parties or attracting one or two outstanding candidates close to an election.

We have to begin to build in that province in the same way we do everywhere else. I know that to be a strong concensus in the party and in the province of Quebec I would be frankly surprised if Claude does not share it but I will have to find out precisely what his concern is. We'll discuss it face to face.

Nobody here belongs to me
Everyone's a dream one way or another,
Count the ways I've played charades
Suddenly I see myself as a stranger,
I just don't understand my dreams
Anyway my behaviour seems to haunt me.

I couldn't get to sleep last night
Tumbling visions collide and tantalize me,
I have had much more than enough
Now it's time that you got tough and faced me, it's as if I lost my soul
In an auction held only for con men.

I couldn't concentrate today
Knowing that I stopped halfway with you,
Don't know if I've touched you yet
But I feel you know my constitution,
Take an educated guess
I don't want to make amends any longer...I'm not that strong.

I wonder if it's too late now
Can one stop the product of infatuation,
I don't know but whatever turns up
I hope it's done before the graduation,
Exploring me in retrospect
Is it me or my imagination?

Seeing that I've lost control
Maybe it's time we had that talk we planned to,
Get around to,
If I saw you,
Saw it fit to.

Record Review

One of last year's best

by Bob Murphy

If you've been wondering what's been happening with Burton Cummings since the break-up of the Guess Who, you'll find all the answers and more on his first solo LP, appropriately titled Burton Cummings.

Cummings, the major force behind the Guess Who, has never been treated too kindly by the rock press. This is strange when you consider that the group's popularity rested largely on the strength of his vocals.

Too, of all the talent that passed through the ever-evolving band during the past decade, Cummings has remained the most consistently interesting writer. He has a terrific ear for melody, and some of the catchiest choruses ever came from the Guess Who—and Burt Cummings. Although his lyrics are often either too deeply rooted in the rock'n'roll mode of the fifties and early sixties to be profound, or try too hard (to the point of pretentiousness) to impress, they are always, at least mildly engaging.

When finally you take into account his progression, over the time, into an excellent keyboard player, it is difficult to see exactly what quarrel the critics have managed to perpetuate with him.

In any case, this new album should end all that. Burton, along with producer Richard Perry, has put together an extremely tasty collection of, mostly mid-temp songs. The exceptions are a couple of joyous up-beat tunes, "Your Back Yard" and "Niki Hokey".

"Your Back Yard" is especially irresistible. Jim Gordon drives the track, sounding wonderfully sloppy on drums, while Randy Stron adds stinging guitar lines, and Cummings, himself, replies with some rambling piano fills.

Perry's slick production manages to work well throughout the album, though it might have been a bit more interesting had there been a little dirt on the tracks. Ray Charles' "That's Enough", in particular seems to cry out for a touch of looseness. Still, this is more a personal preference than a criticism.

The past few months have apparently been a trying time for Burton, and he makes several references on the album that suggest this.

"I'm Scared" is an obvious product of this down period. It is Cummings' most personal work ever, and is a refreshingly sincere and poignant admission. At the same time, his sparkling piano runs exude the underlying tone of optimism which pervades the record.

Also, "Stand Tall", with its soaring chorus and tender lyrics, goes a long way toward affirming Cummings' rediscovery of some much needed confidence. Burt's voice is in great shape, and his self-assurance becomes evident through his incredibly strong vocal execution, even in the extreme registers.

On "Is It Really Right", shimmering layers of piano, synthesized strings and guitars, mingle and swell as he sings, "Fly, just swoop and soar and spin, Glide above where you have been". The effect is absolutely exhilarating.

You'll be glad to know there's also a hilarious 'cocktail lounge' mock-up of ex-partner Randy Bachman's "You Ain't Seen Nothin' Yet" included.

So, here's a fine album, from a fine singer, song-writer and musician—who could ask for more? It's available right now at your favourite record shop, and cheap at twice the price.

Chamber music in town

Music from Marlboro

This Wednesday at 8:30 p.m., Music from Marlboro will bring to Dunning Auditorium outstanding soloists from the Marlboro Music Festival which is under the artistic direction of Rudolf Serkin.

Founded in 1950 by three families bearing the famous musical names of Serkin, Busch and Moysé, the Festival brings together for two months each summer leading musicians from all parts of the U.S. and many foreign countries.

In order to share Marlboro music-making with people throughout the world and to extend Marlboro activities into the regular concert season, Music from Marlboro was created in 1965. Each summer at the Festival, approximately twenty-five musicians are selected to form four touring groups. They rehearse and prepare a program to chamber music masterworks for varied combinations of voice and instruments that are not often heard in live performances.

Their program at Wednesday evening's concert will consist of the Schoenberg's "Verklarte Nacht, Op. 4", Wolf's "Intermezzo for String Quartet", his "Italian Senerade in G Major" and the "String Sextet in A Major, Op. 48" of Dvorak.

Many of today's leading solo and chamber music artists have been part of the touring program, Isidore Cohen and flautist Paula Robison.

Tickets for the Music from Marlboro performance this Wednesday at 8:30 p.m. in Dunning Hall are available for $3.50 and $4.50 (students $1.00 less) at the Performing Arts Box Office (547-6194).

Toronto Dance Theatre

A spirited company - a spirited evening

by Denise Huyler

Thursday evening at the Grand was hardly a dull occasion but rather an amusing and often exciting experience, as was evidenced by the shouts of "bravo" and the spontaneous bursts of laughter that arose from the audience throughout the night.

In a lengthy opening number, marred especially by the obvious tension of the four dancers, the petite but compelling Susan Macpherson carried the dance to its end, delighting the eye whenever she moved. No fear though, for the atmosphere in the theatre changed almost drastically after this piece, and what followed was a truly entertaining evening of dance. Beginning with "Couples Suite", a three-part number performed by the company and featuring Judith Hendin and Eric Bobrow in its second section, the show began moving to foot-tapping African music. The choreography, not particularly difficult, but so original, and the dancers so precise in executing the movements, made this piece a particularly successful one.

"Fratelli" which came next, was indeed bright and lighthearted, it was enhanced to an even greater extent by the brilliantly coloured costumes and school-house set. An air of sadness returned in "The Amber Garden", a piece portraying the injustice of Love - that some of us should be so fortunate as to have more than one lover while others of us are left sitting alone. This piece, though similar to the first one in its movements, flowed more in its lyric beauty and particularly showed off the superextensions of dancer Nancy Ferguson.

The triumphant finale, appropriately titled "National Spirit", was probably the highest point of the evening, with the full company outfitted in various combinations of red, white and blue shorts, socks, leotards suspenders and - yes - tennis shoes. Dancing to a sequence of American marches and anthems (which, for some strange reason, produced goosebumps on my forearms), the company paraded, jumped, crawled, fought and exercised its way to an unusual and ludicrous ending, sprawled out on the floor, apparently too tired to move another step.

In a workshop held at the Phys. Ed. centre on Wednesday evening, Danny Grossman, guest dancer and choreographer with the company, demonstrated his talent with unconventional and imaginary choreography as he pulled all sorts of bodily contortions and facial expressions out of the participants. After this first-hand view of how it's done in the rehearsal studio, there was, for me, an additional thrill in seeing how the completed versions of his calisthenics, bopping heads and flexed feet could be turned into a pulsating whole onstage.

For those of us who had had a full day, the evening was indeed a relaxing one. There was no need to intellectualize every move, instead, all that was asked of us was that we simply enjoy the event. And this was easy enough to do, for the company presented something for everyone, from the soft beauty of "Spiral Stairs" and "The Amber Garden", to the throbbing drums of

Patricia Beatty and David Earle of the Toronto Dance Theatre

"Couples Suite", to the nursery-rhyme tunes of "Fratelli", to the rousing curtain number, "National Spirit". Now that's versatility! (Audience participation, an all-time essential for a successful performance, was so well provided for that I have no qualms about saying that the Toronto Dance Theatre did a fine job of feting us all on Thursday evening.)

CCMC

Some different music

by Paul Trane

If Queen's students can be considered a representative sample of this generation's attitudes towards a new form of music, I look forward to observing the reactions of many unassuming students to meeting the CCMC. Granted, that any serious student of music will not be overwhelmed by the cacophony of spontaneous noises that escape from this ensemble. In fact, many contemporary classical composers have produced works of even more bizarre strains, but to the casual listener who yearns for that throbbing disco beat perhaps a seat belt would be recommended at this performance.

The CCMC is an assemblage of eight musicians who have performed together as the CCMC since 1974. This year the group opened the Music Gallery in Toronto a studio-concert-workshop-exhibition space devoted to new music.

The group presents concerts at the Gallery every Tuesday and Saturday, and have dedicated themselves to 'free compositional structures'. Michael Snow and Graham Coughtry are but two of the members who have distinguished themselves in other media, and any visitor to the Jazz and Blues record centre on Yonge St. will recognize Bill Smith on his upturned soprano sax. The eight man group which includes two reed players, trumpet, piano, trombone, guitar, bass and drums departs from the characteristic blowing session format of linked solos woven together by an underlying theme. Instead, the emphasis is on ensemble performance in a style reminiscent of some of the larger group settings of the American Association of Creative Music (AACM). The music is raw, searching, and the sound is dense, often chaotic, but the energy of performance is not to be faulted. I think you would agree that it is certainly a relief to see a concerned group of musicians not controlled by commercial music standards in any way.

The CCMC is a free music orchestra which has evolved its own style of collective real time composition. The organization of the CCMC's music expresses a personal commitment to a non-prescriptive 'natural order'. Such description adorns the liner of their second album simply CCMC Vol. 2. Their records Vol. 1 and Vol. 2, along with their sister group The Artist's Jazz Band record on Gallery records, a private endeavour dedicated to creative music. Indeed, the organic sounds of this unit would never make the grade at Berry's Gordy's Motown Studio, nor would they want to. The concert is scheduled for 8 pm at Grant Hall on Thursday, January 27. If you're tired of 'getting down to boogie' and looking for a new direction in music, experience the CCMC. The arrival of the CCMC on Queen's Campus signifies an open event, to be approached with an open mind.

At Bitter Grounds this week

Unconventional Blues

"Though diminutive in physical stature, Michael Hasek loomed very large on the stage of Bitter Grounds this past Homecoming weekend. In its own right it was a triumphant homecoming for the (then) twenty-eight year old native of Toronto..."

Thus read the Journal review of Michael Hasek's 1974 appearance at Bitter Grounds. He will be returning to the campus home of folk this weekend for what one hopes will be a repeat of his previous success.

Hasek has all the elements necessary for success. He sings in a full-voiced alto with a pleasant vibrato, plays inventively and writes songs that are strong without being heavy. He works his guitar and harmonica playing and his singing in a blues-oriented style.

Michael Hasek, a personable and unconventional blues performer, will be at Bitter Grounds this weekend (January 28-29).

Drama Department's "Thing"

Bye, Bye, Bard

by Donald Raylco

What happens when one set of Elizabethans borrows from another? when a comedy from the early 1600's is transported into the mid-1960's and viewed from the late 1970's?

Your Own Thing, that's what

You start with Twelfth Night, Shakespeare's bright little comedy about look-alike twins, misidentifications, and a helix of unrequited affections that runs like this: Malvolio thinks Olivia loves him, but she does not; Olivia loves Viola, who is disguised as Cesario, but Viola - Cesario loves Duke Orsino, not Olivia; however Duke Orsino loves Olivia (who does not love him) and he does not love Cesario, who is really Viola, who has a twin brother, Sebastian, who looks just like her and whom she thinks is dead, and he her, but they aren't (dead, that is). And on top of that, there's subplot. That's Twelfth Night.

Discard the subplot, push the story ahead 360 years; make Olivia a discotheque owner, Orsino Orson the theatrical agent, and Viola-Cesario-Sebastian a male rock singer named Charlie; add a strobe light, the Age of Aquarius and some commercial rock numbers, and, baby, like you're moving 'an' groovin' with Your Own Thing, a rock musical. Can ya dig it?

Love, baby. Hippies. Psychedelic light shows. Hash brownies and acid punch in the lobby at intermission. Uncle Sam and Viet Nam.

Ah, nostalgia!

Sit on it, Fonzie—these were the good old days.

And thanks to the Queen's Drama Department and nameless students and staff (What can I say? No programmes. — Maybe they're cutting costs.) those golden days of post-Graffiti grooviness are on display at Convocation Hall in an all-singing all-dancing all-dancing psychedelic [oops] I think I used that word already) extravaganza.

Wait a minute! Some of the time Charlie is really Viola (a girl), and some of the time really Sebastian (a guy), and Olivia and Orson both have the hots for Charlie — that's homosexuality! I mean, if Olivia is panting after Charlie, but Charlie is Viola, then somebody somewhere is gay. And if Orson is wanting to get it off with Viola, but thinks she's a he, then he's queer.

How liberal! They're really earning brownie points for open-mindedness with that one. And at the cost of discomfort to no one, because the amorous interactions that take place between Orson and Charlie and between Olivia and Charlie are really between Orson and Viola, and Olivia and Sebastian. So it's okay. I mean, so what if the actor playing Orson and the actress playing Olivia each behave differentially toward Charlie-Viola and Charlie-Sebastian, who are, presumably, indistinguishable. Small things like that will never be noticed, and tolerance toward deviant sexual orientations is so fashionable these days that the show is sure to be praised for it.

But with all these changes in the plot, how are we going to remind the folks that this show is based on Twelfth Night, by SHAKESPEARE, and therefore culturally refined? By sticking in a few speeches actually lifted from The Bard, that's how. And if, after contemporary colloquial prose, abruptly interposed chunks of Elizabethan blank verse stumble awkwardly off the tongue and land on the stage like soggy sandbags (which they do), that'll just make it all the more obvious that this stuff is really high class, and good for them.

We'll make it a sight spectacular. With snappy, eyeboggling visual effects. Everyone will be so impressed with the two minutes of strobe lights that no one will notice that the bread-and-butter lighting in the rest of the show that's simply supposed to illuminate the stage, doesn't. And if the witty remarks made by amplified disembodied voices are too fuzzy to make out, at least we know what they're saying—because it's written down in the script.

Seriously! Now, folks, on the positive side: the broad, sit-com style acting doesn't clash with the material, and Sebastian, Olivia, and especially Viola at the end of the first act, manage to belt out a few good vocal numbers. Two of the three other members of the rock group Charlie joins, can sing, and one can almost dance. So the show does have its bright moments.

Anyway, it's the kind of thing you can take your mother to.

Hubba-hubba, hep-cats.

Additional events

Two events that were in negotiation at the writing of our last edition have now been finalized, and both are worth special note because of the calibre of the performers.

On Wednesday, Jan. 26, Valerie Lloyd Watts will play in the Ban Righ Fireside room at 6:00 p.m. Ms. Watts' performances are valued both for her fine piano work, and for her engaging personality.

Appearing on Sunday Jan. 30 at 6:30 p.m. in the Ban Righ Fireside Room will be the Vaghy String Quartet, Queen's resident artists and known and respected world-wide. Both performances are a must!

Graduate Student Society

The ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING of the Graduate Student Society will be held on Thursday, February 10, 1977 at 8:00 p.m. in the second floor Common Room of the Student's Union.

NOMINATIONS ARE OPEN FOR THE FOLLOWING POSITIONS: President, Vice-President, Treasurer, Secretary and two GSS Reps to the AMS. The term of office for each position is March 1, 1977 to February 28, 1978. All nominations must include the signature of the nominee and the position for which he or she is being nominated. Nominations must be submitted to Doug Bates, Department of Mathematics by February 10, 1977.

Boniwell leads 68-57 basketball upset

Gaels surprise the Yeomen

Gaels' Coach Pete Smith — Lawrence by Brian Clarke
It finally happened.

The Queen's University Golden Gaels proved that they can not only win basketball games at home but do it in good style.

Before almost 1,500 cheering Queen's students and fans in Bartlett Gym Friday night, the Gaels upset the York University Yeomen 68-57. It was the first time in five years of Ontario University Athletic Association Basketball League action that Queen's had beaten York and the Gaels first home win this season.

A dazed York coach Bob Bain could offer only one comment... "I can't believe it. I tried to warn the players all week that Queen's wasn't going to be a push-over. I guess it didn't sink in."

Obviously either it didn't or more likely, as Queen's coach Pete Smith would have everyone think, the Gaels suddenly came to life and showed their true potential.

It's difficult to argue with Smith's hypothesis. The Gaels took the lead in the game almost from the opening jump, getting the first basket a few seconds later and then riding high to victory.

"It was an intelligent game," said coach Smith. "I mean we weren't running around up and down the floor like a bunch of chickens with our heads cut off."

Certainly the Gaels didn't play like chickens at all, more like tigers. After taking a 30-32 halftime lead, they toyed with York through the second half, always remaining at least six points ahead, and then moved in for the kill, an appetizing 11-point victory.

Topping the Gaels scoring was Andy Bonniwell with 19 points, while Steve McCredy netted 16, and Henry Garbaty had 15.

Chris McNelly had the most points for the Yeomen, getting 15, while Ed Siebert got 12, and Romeo Callegro managed 11.

The Gaels rousing victory came despite the services of five season starters. Largely for academic reasons, Bruce Nickel, Dave Dempster, Lorenz Paulsen, Derek Swinnard, and Sean Pritchard have left the Queen's ranks. Nevertheless, coach Smith's squad, inspired by the quickness Steve "Speedy" McCredy and Bob Cooney, and the enthusiasm of freshman Kim Carlton and Steve Simmons humbled the Yeomen.

Rebounding was a major factor in the game's final outcome. The Gaels out-rebounded the Yeomen 49-28, with the greater part of the difference coming in the second half when Queen's needed it the most.

Cooney key to breaking press RM

Boniwell and Garbaty gained the most rebounds for Queen's, with 21 and 12 respectively. The Yeomen's top rebounder, McNelly managed only eight, while their second best man, Siebert, had seven.

Track team smash marks

by Duncan Card and Sue Plummer

Although the men's team composed of only ten athletes, was lacking in quantity, they were by no means lacking in quality. Indeed, two new Queen's records were established this past weekend as miler Bob McCormack ran a 4:09.4 in his event to place second overall, and a "Chompin' Mike Forsayeth high jumped his way to third place overall and a new Queen's record of 6'5" (1.95 meters).

The final event of the day, the 4x600 meter relay produced yet another Queen's record as Tony Verhoeven, Walt Sepic, Charlie Hitchin, and Bob McCormack breezed to an easy victory.

In the men's long jump, decathlete Tony Verhoeven and rookie, Kevin Pelchos jumped 6.24 meters and 6.13 meters to place third and fifth respectively overall.

In the 50-meter sprint Kevin Pelchos recorded another fifth place in his heat with a time of 6.2 seconds. Tom Saunders placed fourth in his heat with a time of 6.2 seconds.

In the final of that event Duncan Card was an easy winner with a time of 5.8 seconds, a tenth of a second ahead of his team mate Vic Gooding who placed fourth with a time of 5.9 seconds.

In the men's 400-meter race Chuck Hitchon and Jim Wilson ran 52 seconds flat and 52.1 seconds to place third and fourth respectively—good times and good placing in a very competitive field!

Lastly I wish to mention the Queen's track athletes who as a result of outstanding performances at this meet have been invited to participate in the Toronto Star Maple Leaf Indoor Games coming up in February. They are Bob (Doc) McCormack, in the invitational mile, and the members of the Queen's Mile Relay team. Vic Gooding, Tony Verhoeven, Charlie Hitchin, and Tim Page, or Duncan Card. (Duncan is a likely candidate himself to get into the invitational 50m sprint event). This meet is the top indoor meet in Canada so this is indeed an accomplishment.

On the distaff side at the meet in an effort to sober up manager "Dad" his girls dragged him off for an early morning tour of the women's locker room but despite his ailment he managed to pull us through the day. Barb Burton, Leslie LaMorre and Alison Mitchell (coming off the season with good opening times, in the 50m. In the 1500m, Anne Macmillan placed fourth with a time of 5:04 followed by Beth Buckingham with a P.B. of 5:14.6 and Sue Plummer in 5:21, not 5:32. Derwood, Jan Pipe, came through with a new Queen's record of 60.5 in the 400m. Kathy Cook and Lauren Macwilliam also had good showings in this event. Jan Henderson placed fifth in the 800m.

Jean Dietric's 1.55m jump was her best performance in high jump this season. Leslie La Morre's second attempt at the long jump resulted in a jump of 4.63m placing her fifth. Alison Mitchell finished eighth with a jump of 4.44m.

Despite an effort by the York team to impede Critter's progress, our 4x200 relay team of Barb, Laurin, Kathy, and Jan finished fourth.

By the way Bob and Tony, Dad does not think MacDonalds is good enough for his children!

sports 19

Queen's also was able to break the renowned Yeomen full-court press defence. York coach Bain singled it out prior to the game's start as a prime part of his team's game strategy. By disrupting it, the Gaels inflicted chaos on the Yeomen defence.

Highlights in the final moments of play by the Gaels included some crack foul shooting. Bonniwell went four for five in the last four minutes, while Cooney was two for two.

The Gaels upset win improves their OUA record to 2-6, with them playing next on Wednesday night against the Royal Military College Redmen at RMC at 8:15 p.m. The Redmen are winless in ten games so far this season, and it should be an excellent opportunity for the Gaels to grab another victory.

Squash Gals come on strong at Waterloo

The Golden Gals Squash Team again demonstrated their superb playing ability last weekend as they easily won the Fourth Annual Waterloo Invitational squash tournament. At the end of the day Queen's had participated in twenty matches within this five-team round robin competition. The Gals, playing without their number one player Sandra Harris, who chose to compete in the Quebec Closed Championships, lost only two matches. For their efforts the Ladies' Team received the Molson's Trophy. This tournament wraps up the varsity competitions, the Queen's and Waterloo Invitationals.

The championships will be held on February 18, 19 at McMaster. Currently the Gals are ranked as the team to beat. However, York, which finished second at the Waterloo Invitational, has been strongly improving all season and may provide a stiff challenge for the Gals. York's number one player, who has not competed thus far this season because of a blood clot in her arm, is now back in competitive shape. Jana Sawtnok of Queen's, unfortunately lost to her 2-9, 7-9 Jana, however, easily won her other three matches quite convincingly. In her match against U. of T. she routed her opponent 9-0, 9-0.

Winning all four of their matches were Jo-Ann Price, Roma Steele and Jane Forbes-Roberts. Donna Wormington won three of her matches but lost one to McMaster. Donna won her first game 9-3, but then lost the next two 5-9, 5-9. In order to maintain their high calibre of play the Gals will be playing in open competitions and tournaments until the championships next month.

Worthington takes heavyweight title

Queen's wrestler on top at Guelph

by Alex Faseruk

An old sport's quote which is frequently kicked around locker rooms is "When the going get tough, the tough get going." This quote epitomizes Roy Worthington's performance last Saturday at the Guelph Open Wrestling Tournament. In calibre of competition the Guelph Open ranks a very close second to the Canadian National Championship. Roy was, however, very capable of displaying his toughness as he captured top laurels at the Guelph Tournament.

Competing in the heavyweight class, Roy displayed his dominance by reaching the finals with a pin over a Michigan wrestler and a convincing 19-2 win over Eric Anderson from the London Wrestling Club. In the championship match Coach Worthington was confronted by Roger Bernier who has won many Quebec Championships. Roy has met Bernier twice before in matches this season. Roy was able to defeat Bernier twice before in matches this season. Roy was able to defeat Bernier at the Ryerson Open but came out on the losing side of the ledger at the Montreal Open. At Guelph, Roy was able to dominate the match and came through with a 6-2 decision.

In the last few years Queen's has been somewhat successful at the Guelph Open. In 1974 George Saunders captured the 190 lb. championship. George, who was a member of the 1976 Canadian Olympic Team. After his loss to Danier, Muller won a match in the consolation finals where he lost but still finished fourth for the tournament at 167 lbs.

Jim Muller (220 lbs.), was the other Gael to fare well at this year's version of the Guelph Open, which attracted 150 wrestlers from all of the prominent schools and clubs in both Ontario and Quebec. Jim won his first two matches and advanced to the semi-finals where he wrestled well against Steve Danier, from Lakehead University, who was a member of the 1976 Canadian Olympic Team. After his loss to Danier, Muller won a match in the consolation finals where he lost but still finished fourth for the tournament.

The rest of the Golden Grapplers did not fare well this weekend. Many of them encountered some fairly tough draws. In the 134 lb weight class Larry Pearson had to wrestle against Eric Folbert in the first round of competition. Folbert is a former Canadian junior champion and is presently attending the University of Western Ontario. Rick Turton, at 150 lbs met Olympic team alternate Joe Dell'Aquila in his first match. With a few breaks in the draw the Gaels would probably have fared better.

Next weekend the Gaels will be travelling to London to compete in the Western Open.

Skiers excel at Collingwood

Following on their success of two weeks ago when they won the International Intercollegiate Alpine Championship at Georgian Peaks, Queen's men's alpine team continued their winning ways by topping the twelve entries in the season's first giant slalom of the Ontario Universities Ski Series. The race was run at Blue Mountain in the Collingwood area last weekend and was hosted by the University of Toronto. The two-run giant slalom was won by Mark Bell of Toronto. The best placing by Queen's was Tim Wardrop's 6th place finish but the entire six-man team placed in the top 14 with Reid Drury in 7th, Ian Neilson 8th, Rob Gripper 11th, Brian Fitzpatrick 13th, and Bill Hartman 14th. Since the four best times count in the men's team score, Queen's had solid placings good for first place by a decisive margin, 160 points to York's next best 147 points.

Although perhaps best known for his rugged abilities - Drury in his first ski race as a Gael demonstrated his overall ability and obviously lends a lot of strength and depth to the men's team.

The Queen's girls came 4th in the women's giant slalom race. It was won by Andrea Esson of the University of Toronto, with Sue Graves of Western 2nd, and Jane McGillivray of Queen's 3rd. Janice Rahn, Mary Chaput, and Stephanie Currie all were strong finishers.

Women's gymnastic team swings through hectic schedule

by Tom Shand

The Queen's Women's Gymnastics Team has had a hectic schedule in the first few weeks of this winter term. University gymnastics is divided into three categories for competition. Queen's has fielded competitive teams at the junior, intermediate, and senior levels.

The juniors and the intermediates were first to taste post-holiday action as three members of the Gaels team made the trip to York for a competition on Saturday, January 15. Seven teams competed with Queen's, which finished fourth despite the fact the other schools fielded teams of up to 12 members.

Birdmen place second Yee, top individual

by Mike Stoute

On the weekend, the men's badminton team travelled to Toronto to play in the Ryerson Invitational. The tournament attracted ten university teams, and Queen's did extremely well, placing a close second behind the University of Western Ontario. Individually, Peter Yee had a great day, winning the sixth singles and teaming up with Richard Trimble to get a second place in their third doubles position. They lost in the finals to Western. Richard, playing fifth singles won a match, Stuart Howard, playing second singles also did extremely well. He beat U of T in the finals to win. He then teamed up with Mike Stoute to play first doubles. They lost a tight match to Western for a third place finish. Mike, playing third singles, lost to York for another third finish.

Paul Buckley played first singles, losing his first match, then proceeded to win the consolation event, beating Guelph in the finals. He and his partner Neil McGowan played second doubles and obtained a second place by losing to Western in the finals. Neil also played fourth singles and did a repeat, losing in the finals to Western for another second place. Let's hope we can play even better in two weeks, when the team goes to RMC for the East Sectional.

Charlie O. Finley was a donkey

by Chris Chenoweth

To many of his players, his managers and staff, and to thousands of hockey and baseball fans in America and Canada, Charlie O. Finley is viewed as an idiot par excellence. For those who are unknowledgeable in the ways of sport, Charles Finley is the owner of the Oakland Athletics of baseball fame, and was once owner of hockey's now defunct California Golden Seals (or was it hip-hopotami?). As an owner and major figure in sports news, Finley has shown himself to be ungracious in victory, and downright rude in defeat. Called an eccentric in polite circles, Playboy magazine recently termed Finley "a cad among sporting gentlemen; a tyrant who specializes in humiliating his men." (Nov., 1976)

Examples abound of the demanding attitude Finley exhibits towards the human flesh who work for him. Hours after a tearful Mike Andrews had committed two errors at second base in a baseball game that cost the Oakland A's a World Series game, Charles O. was twisting Andrews arm to sign himself onto the disabled list - and thus off the team. Andrews later regretted his duty-felt acceptance of his owner's demands, he is currently suing Finley for inhuman and unjust treatment under the U.S. Labour Codes

Playboy has also reported an incident involving Finley and the long-haired and controversial Joe Pepitone, in which Finley reportedly ordered his ball-park announcer to introduce the long-haired player as "Josephine Pepitone". Rather than endure the embarrassment, the announcer quit. When scout Bill Rigney returned a week early from a scouting assignment, and told Finley it was because his wife was sick, Charlie replied, "You're fired." No wonder Charles O. has gone through 13 managers, eight publicity directors, seven farm directors and five G.M.s in eleven years. Finley finally had to assume the job of General Manager himself - perhaps because no one else would take it.

These are the type of incidents which have made Charlie Finley infamous in the sporting world. Yet it has only been in the last month that the true consequences have come out of allowing a man like Finley to own a sports team, let alone permitting him into a ball park. Eight all-star ball players from those same Oakland A's have signed contracts with other baseball franchises, rather than putting up with Finley as an employer any longer. As a result, Finley has caused the appearance of 'bidding wars' in baseball for ball players services, an inflationary innovation which will ultimately cause ticket prices to soar sky high, and will thus leave the fan to suffer the final expenses. Finley has even lost two complete sports franchises due to bungling management - the old Kansas City Athletics in 1964 (champions until Finley's appearance on the scene), and the hockey California Golden Seals in 1975. Yet, somehow Finley is still in the game, and currently destroying the fortunes of the once proud world champions Oakland A's.

A more devious example of Finley's mind concerned a donkey who was the A's team mascot. The mule was called, appropriately, "Charlie O". It seems Finley even went as far as to book the animal in the Presidential suite of any hotel that would take it when the team was on the road - while the players were accommodated in the cheaper rooms downstairs. Charlie probably views his ball players as a lower order on the biological scale than even his ass.

Sadly, Finley's donkey, Charlie O., died last month, reportedly of a bad temperament. Finley may have lost the only true friend in the world he ever had.

What to do with an empty Blue.

Canadians: Kingston's ★ finest ★

by Frank Pagnucco

Since 1973, the Kingston Canadians have provided their fans in the Limestone City with an exciting brand of hockey. In that year a number of local business men pooled their resources to bring Major Junior A hockey to Kingston. These men included Jim Magee, the current club president, Dr. Michael Simurda, Dr. Garry Wagner, P.J. Radley, and J.D. Cunningham. The present General Manager, Walter "Punch" Scherer was appointed in 1973.

In their first year of operation, the Kingston Canadians surpassed all expectations by finishing the season with a 20-43-7 record; something that no other expansion team in the Ontario Hockey Association had accomplished. In their second year, the Canadians made the playoffs only to lose a thrilling seven game series to the Toronto Marlboros, the eventual Memorial Cup champions.

Last year the Canadians ran into some hot goaltending in their playoff series against the Ottawa 67's and were again forced to bow out of the O.H.A. championship race. Presently the Kingston Canadians are in the thick of a battle for first place along with the Sudbury Wolves and the Ottawa 67's.

The success of the Canadians can be attributed to the combined talents of the general manager, "Punch" Scherer, the team's coach Jim Morrison and the players. In the last three years there has been a steady stream of hockey talent emanating from Kingston into the two professional hockey leagues. The list of junior Canadians that have been drafted into the National Hockey League and the World Hockey Association is impressive.

It includes Gord Buncyk (St. Louis Blues), Greg Holst and Barry Scully (New York Rangers), Peter Driscoll (Calgary Cowboys), Alex Forsyth (Washington Capitals), Jim Weaver and Bob Mears (Los Angeles Kings), Brad Rhines (San Diego Mariners), Michael O'Connell (Chicago Black Hawks), Greg Hotham (Toronto Maple Leafs), Dave Hynek and Mark Souser (Philadelphia Flyers).

Cole & Co. defeat Gals

Queen's Hockey Gals were bitterly disappointed this weekend after losing their match in Hamilton against McMaster University by 4 to 0. In another season encounter with Mac at Queen's, Mac barely slipped by with a 3-2 victory. Unfortunately, they did more than slip by this time. They opened up the game early with two fairly quick goals, immediately forcing Queen's to play defensive hockey. Although the score was 3-0 for Mac at the end of the first period, Queen's returned in the second and third periods playing much stronger offensive hockey. This, however, was not enough to get them past the excellent Mac goalie, whose performance was similar to that of a brick wall.

Next weekend, January 29th, at 2:00 p.m., Queen's plays their final home game. Let's see if we can get as much support as McMaster did! Thanks goes to our five "imported" fans who developed laryngitis trying to shout out McMaster fans. See you all at next week's game.

Mac's Lois Cole let loose with a

Bruins baking mad at Beantown apathy

by Michael Fitzgibbon

Move over Rich Little, there's a new impressionist in Boston, Massachusetts. Bruins coach Don Cherry has he recites "We don't get no respect." His players aren't laughing or applauding though - they are wondering what they have to do to stir Beantown's apathetic fans.

The 15,003 seat Boston Garden has not been filled to capacity this year. The Bruins are averaging slightly under 11,000 spectators a game, but the amazing part is that the team has played extremely well on their home ice. The league-leading Montreal Canadiens brought their powerful machine to Boston on Monday night and were greeted with 2,000 no-shows. The game hardly raised an eyebrow in this frigid New England city, yet the Bruins have spanked the Habs twice this season.

A large number of Bostonians are acting like spoiled kids. They are still putting over the loss of superstar

Bobby Orr who became a Chicago Black Hawk last June. Many continue to raise a stink over Chicago's lack of compensation for No. 4 while altogether ignoring the fact that Mr. Orr's hockey career is rapidly sliding to an end. He has appeared in only one-third of the Black Hawk games this season, and his doctor has disclosed that the defenceman's battle-scarred knees have pretty much had it. Bostonians are showing their displeasure at the Bruins management by staying away from the Gardens.

Their antics might be justified if the Boston Bruins weren't winning, but they are. The team is in a neck and neck battle with the red hot Buffalo Sabres for the Adams Division lead. Boston has proven that they can play the leagues cream of the crop and beat them. Don Cherry's squad has the fourth best record in the league at 28-13-4.

Coach Cherry believes that the team's success lies in its togethness, saying "They go out together, hang around together, play together, and help one another all the time." Cherry's duties have been eased with the departure of Phil Esposito to New York. Former Bruins boss Bep Guidolin once linked Esposito to the Godfather saying that the burly center always wanted things done his way. Now that Esposito is gone Cherry has the reins in hand.

The Bruins success formula also involves a mixture of veterans and youth. Peter McNab, who was obtained from Buffalo in a swap for Andre Savard, leads the team in scoring with 29 goals and 29 assists. The 6'3" 210 pound forward also has made his presence known, crunching opposing players like cardboard. Gregg Sheperd, the mustachioed center has collected 12 goals while assisting on 21 Rich Middleton, Bobby Schmautz, and Terry O'Reilly have all contributed to Boston's potent attack.

Boston has players old enough to be collecting pensions. Dallas Smith, Johnny Bucyk, Wayne Cashman, and Jean Ratelle continue to ignore the aches and pains of old age and hustle around as if they were teenagers. Ratelle has tucked in 21 goals, while Bucyk still plagues NHL netminders. The 41 year old Bruins captain recently vaulted past Maurice Richard into fourth place on the NHL's all-time scoring list. Aggressive and balding Wayne Cashman is out of the doghouse and is once again jolting the daylight out of alien skaters.

The defensive corps have shaped up and have eased the load of goalies Gilles Gilbert and Gerry Cheevers. Cheevers is back in great form while the baby-faced Gilbert remains an acrobat between the pipes. The two goalies have a combined goals-against-average of 2.14.

It's a damn shame that Bostonians are treating their team as if they were the Colorado Rockies. Don Cherry has constructed a winning, exciting, and aggressive team in Beantown and the Bruins have shown that they can win without Orr and Esposito. The Bruins deserve a lot more support and respect, it's high time that the people of Boston wake up and smell the coffee.

Venezuelan Volleyballers victorious in Int'l tourney

A strong Venezuela team defeated a squad representing Iran to win by a margin of three games to none to win the International Club Volleyball Championship for 1976-1977. Both teams had equal 3 and 0 records coming into the finals. Germany had the next best record with 2 wins and 2 losses while Canada, Asia, and the West Indies had identical records of one win and two losses. The team representing Europe was the only team competing which failed to register a victory.

Inauguration

Jimmy Carter became the 39th President of the United States Thursday in a chilly Inauguration ceremony. He immediately broke with tradition by walking the one and a half miles from the Capitol building, where he was sworn in, to the White House.

In his speech, Mr. Carter thanked Mr. Ford for what he did to heal the United States. He also stressed that the United States must show a new national spirit of unity and trust and could be better than before. However, he noted that even the United States has recognized limits, and that it can neither answer all questions nor solve all problems. The President was cheered when he pledged a new commitment to end the arms race, adding that the elimination of all nuclear weapons from this earth was the "ultimate goal."

BNA Act

Prime Minister Trudeau has asked the provincial premiers once again to agree to bring the British North America Act, the Canadian Constitution, from England to Canada. The Constitution is presently contained in acts of the British Parliament; therefore, amendments to it require support of that parliament.

As well as bringing the Constitution under Canadian control, Mr. Trudeau wants negotiations started again on amendments to the constitution, which would include division of power between federal and provincial governments. During meetings on the constitution held last year, the provincial premiers could not manage to agree on a suitable amending formula. The one proposed would require approval by Ontario, Quebec, at least two Western provinces and at least two Maritime provinces, before constitutional changes could be made.

Foreign investment

Industry Minister Jean Cretien is proposing changes to the Foreign Investment Review Agency (FIRA) which could mean more foreign investment in Canada. FIRA, established in 1974, examines proposed takeovers of Canadian businesses by foreign interests and establishment of foreign-controlled businesses in Canada, allowing them only if they are of "substantial benefit" to the country. The proposed changes to the FIRA would shorten the time required for investigating the proposed foreign investment. The three months presently required is too long a period for some investors. So far FIRA has agreed to the majority of proposed takeovers and initial foreign investments under its review.

Carter gives pardon

United States' President, Jimmy Carter, has decided to grant pardons to all Viet Nam war evaders. However, deserters will still be subject to prosecution if they return to the U.S. About half of the approximately 22,000 Americans in exile will be affected by the decision.

The Carter decision has met severe criticism from the Veterans of Foreign Wars who called it "one of the saddest days in the history of our country." Some of the exiles plan to fight for a blanket pardon for all, even though they are able to return to the United States. Several of the exiles said they felt badly about being granted a pardon instead of amnesty, as the pardon implies they did something wrong.

Boycott blacklisted

The Ontario government will refuse to do business with any firm that complies with the Arab boycott of Israel. The news was released by Premier William Davis at the end of his 10-day visit to Israel. Mr. Davis described the boycott as "the kind of policy that we as a government could never support." He also added that the government may be able to take action against companies who comply with the boycott under the Ontario Human Rights code.

The province will request that the federal government provide them with a list of all companies who comply with the Arab boycott. Such firms can expect to have their names made public and will not receive any financial assistance under the Ontario Development Corporation programs, from loans or any form of trade assistance.

MD's reviewed

The medical review committee of the Ontario College of Physicians and Surgeons will review more than 400 of the doctors listed as billing the Ontario Health Insurance Plan more than $100,000 in 1974-75. The Legislature's Public Accounts Committee wants the results of the investigation turned over, but their first request was refused. The accounts committee will recommend further action by the Legislature if they are not satisfied with the disciplinary action being taken by the review board.

Parkland

In under two years Parks Canada has expanded its land holdings in the Thousand Islands by about sixty-three percent. Last Wednesday Parks Canada bought 370 acres in the centre of the Thousand Islands for $1,150,000, and officials hope to acquire a further 525 acres on Hill Island in the next few days.

The land will probably be used as an expansion of the St. Lawrence Islands National Park. This park now includes twenty islands spread out for a distance of fifty miles between Kingston and Brockville.

Criticism will most likely be forthcoming. Many people feel that Parks Canada is acquiring land before planning uses for it, instead of planning uses and then purchasing appropriate land.

A socio-economic study is examining the impact of such land purchases in this area, and additional land acquisition may be postponed until the study is published. There is also a freeze on land purchase established by Judd Buchanan, former Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs. Both the land bought on Wednesday and the Hill Island land is exempted from this land freeze.

Snow

Already snowfall in Kingston is five inches above the average January total of twenty inches. And not much of the fifty inches of snow that has fallen this winter has melted away either. The greater amount of snow this year and the ten percent inflation-rate are expected to increase the annual cost per mile of snow management to $5,700 from last year's $5,181.

In an effort to save money the city has reduced the number of men working on snow removal by about thirty. Public criticism of the snow control in the city has sharpened recently, and the work-to-rule campaign being intermittently adhered to by the public works department employees has done nothing to help the situation.

Township roads tend to be well cleared, but city streets are often uncleared. Some streets even get totally missed, which should surely please those who dislike shovelling their driveways in the wake of the plows!

MacDonalds

Kingston's MacDonald's restaurant cooks and sells 226,000 pounds of beef in 1.2 million hamburgers a year. To help it go down, they whip up 21,000 gallons of milkshake.

Rick Hession, the owner of the Kingston restaurant, got together $125,000 to buy into the business, and during his first year in it he worked about one hundred hours a week. He now also owns a restaurant in Brockville, and in addition to his current forty hours of work per week at the two restaurants, he puts in twenty-five hours on promotional and community work.

He has won MacDonald's top award for licensees and the Kingston Ad and Sales Club has picked him as retailer of the year. He talks of community service as an integral part of MacDonald's, but critics tend to see this side of the business as a subtle ploy for more business and money. Whatever the situation may be, MacDonald's is doing well in Kingston, as is Rick Hession, who is planning to open a third restaurant in the future.

Odds and ends

Mrs. Alita Monaghan wins about two hundred dollars a year by entering every contest, lottery and draw possible. She has also won a hefty number of bigger prizes, bringing her total number of prizes since 1970 to over two hundred. Now the Ottawa Board of Education has hired her to teach a course on her specialty, how to win contests.

The leaning tower of Pisa may find itself behind a cage of steel bars if efforts to stabilize the soil under it don't stop its rate of tipping, average of one-sixteenth of an inch per year.

Chilly south

Florida and the Bahamas have felt some of the effects of the extreme cold spell that has hit more northerly areas. Snow fell in many parts of Florida and in Freeport in the Bahamas.

The cold snap resulted in crop losses of citrus fruits and vegetables which will undoubtedly result in higher prices in Canadian stores for the fresh produce.

AMS Constables will be cracking down on Pub patrons who begin their evening refreshments before they get inside. The LLBO's been complaining. This motley group came over from the JOURNAL office to stage this shot illustrating the story we buried below.

Queen's Journal
Volume 104 Number 28 Friday, January 28, 1977

Residence prices rise to $1,747 for '77-78

Women's residence fees for a single room will rise $157 to $1747 next year. For men, fees will be up $137 to $1747. For double room and board, the price next year will be $1682 for both men and women, according to the proposed budget for Residences next year. The budget still needs to be approved by the Principal.

The budget provides for a salary of $9,000 for a French Floor Coordinator. There are two French Floors in Victoria Hall this year and according to Mrs. Reid, Dean of Women, the floors have worked out "very well indeed." If demand for places on the French Floors is as great next year as it was this year then the French Floor will expand. "We had to turn many people away," said Dean Reid.

Gavin Laws, chairman of the Leonard Field Residence Society told the Journal that the LFRS may not support the introduction of the French Floor Coordinator "because it seems like an awful lot of money for just 100 students."

A total of $61,300 has been transferred from the University budget to the Residence budget, Professor Gerald McGrath, Director of Residences, says the proposition (of stopping transfer payments from the university to the residence budget) is "not an unreasonable one." The report also states that Residences will assume the cost of 20 per cent of the total needed to operate the Dean of Women's office which amounts to $8,200. The residences will also assume the cost of the Conference Coordinator's Office which totals $39,500. Previously this cost was absorbed by the University while the residences received most of the revenues from conferences most of which take place in the summer. Also, residences will pay for the free room and board that the dons and wardens receive.

Most of the other increases in costs reflect normal increases in utilities, heat salaries, taxes and insurance.

Professor McGrath said that "new fees are required to close the gap between projected expenses for 1977-78 and projected revenues from 1976-77 revenues."

Notice to candidates

Candidates for all AMS and faculty society elections should submit their campaign statements NO LATER THAN 5 P.M., MONDAY, JANUARY 31. ASUS Candidates have until 5 pm, Wednesday, February 3. Photographs will be taken in the Tricolor office on Saturday, January 29, from 7 pm to 9 pm and on January 30, from 10 am until 3 pm.

Statements must be typed (set typewriter margins for 75 spaces) and will not be accepted if they exceed 20 lines.

PUC agrees to $15,500 discount for Bus-it

by Anne Johnson
A tentative financial agreement on Bus-It has been reached with the Public Utilities Commission, Paul Steep, AMS Vice-President (Operations) announced last Wednesday. The cost for the Bus-It scheme will amount to $98,500 - a considerable reduction from the $114,000 price originally requested by the PUC. Last year the total bill for Bus-It was $87,000.

1025 mugs in 3 months

Pub staff cracks down

by Annette Nicholson

Six people have been caught taking mugs from the Queen's Pub in the past week and will be taken before the AMS Court, according to Pub Manager Jim Russell.

The culprits were stopped by spot checks, which are being randomly conducted. Russell explained that not everyone can be frisked, but the checks are being stepped up because of the recent rash of thefts this term. Since October 15, 1025 mugs have disappeared from the Pub. Total losses in glasses and mugs have reached $933.58.

Russell said that he is treating the situation very seriously, calling the thefts "selfish," since the money could be spent in some other way, such as decorating the Pub. The thefts are just "ripping themselves off," he said.

AMS Chief Constable, Tom Taylor, explained that it is difficult to catch all the thefts, particularly when there is a line-up, and the constables on the door are more concerned with letting students in than with checking those leaving.

Russell has drawn attention to the fact that the Pub was visited last Saturday by a Liquor Board inspector, who pointed out that the Pub management is responsible to make sure there is no drinking in the line-ups. Therefore, this weekend anyone caught drinking in the line-up will be asked to relinquish the alcohol, or to leave the premises, said Russell.

Taylor has assigned to the door for Friday and Saturday three constables, one of whom will be outside most of the evening checking for alcohol.

Steep's original proposal was $93,000, but he said, "There was no doubt that it was a negotiating position only. We extracted important concessions (a volume percentage discount) from the PUC that may prove to be a real accomplishment in years to come."

The PUC still needs to vote its approval for the deal negotiated but PUC General Manager J. Kenneth Fee considered the agreement a compromise which was mutually beneficial to the PUC and the university students. He said that the increase in the total cost reflects the overall fare increase of approximately 15 percent. He pointed out that the students have gained an added advantage this past year, as they are paying the equivalent of only 25c per ride, while single ride costs have risen to 30c. Mr. Fee did not believe that the negotiations dragged - the agreement was hammered out within three meetings.

Steep considers the price fair to the extent that he can, with good conscience, put the proposed increase to the students in a referendum. "Students should at least have the opportunity to say yes or no," said Steep. Steep is now negotiating with the University to raise its share of the total cost from $35,000 to $40,000. This should keep each individual student's contribution to Bus-It to under $6.00. At present student's each pay $5.35 to the scheme.

"If the University fails to increase its contribution, Paul and I would no longer support the deal," AMS President Jamie Avis told the Journal Wednesday night. "But they've shown every willingness" to make an additional contribution, he continued. "It's just a matter of how much."

The agreement is based on full fare for every ride, so that students are not getting preferential treatment. The first 100,000 rides are calculated at the full fare of 30c. Thereafter there is a 10 percent discount for the next 100,000 rides taken, and further discounts on the added amounts of rides. The PUC calculates the number of student users by taking four week-long counts per year.

Let the corporations pay more

OFS supports anti-increase walkout

by Chris Hall

The Ontario Federation of Students will back a Queen's demonstration against the tuition hikes even if the demonstration amounts to a boycott of classes," said Abdool-Gafur, an OFS fieldworker who was visiting Queen's last Tuesday. While the OFS specifically recommended only class moratoriums and mass meetings, Gafur added that although the action planned by OFS is strictly speaking a boycott of classes by students, it is being referred to as a moratorium—a term thought to be more "innocuous" and less likely to upset students.

Gafur said that Guelph, Ryerson, and Carleton are holding a referendum as to whether or not to have a moratorium. "The referendum is being held in universities where student opinion is unsure on the issue of tuition hikes, although all universities present at the OFS conference held in Toronto earlier this month revealed their opposition to the tuition hike."

The referendum will consist of two questions, according to Gafur. The first will simply ask students whether or not they oppose the tuition hike. Contingent upon an affirmative answer, the next question will ask whether students would support their student council in holding a moratorium on classes.

OFS has advocated that corporations as opposed to private citizens, should pay a greater share of rising university costs. "Although these are lean years, corporate profits are phenomenal." On the other hand, Gafur conceded that the OFS had undertaken little investigation concerning the decreasing number of jobs available to university graduates during this period of financial constraint. However, Gafur, did state that, "OFS is exploring government attitudes toward corporate profits being used for job creations. OFS sees a need for job creation programs."

Gafur maintains that "Students from upper and middle classes constitute the majority of students in university, the working class is not fairly represented. The tuition fees raise further barriers to these students. OFS feels no student should be denied access to university because of finances."

Former red guard to speak about revolution

by Kenneth Cheng

Carl Crook, former Redguard of the Chinese Cultural Revolution, will be at Queen's on Saturday, February 3, under the auspices of Queen's Chinese Club. Mr. Crook will attend an informal discussion sponsored by the Club at the Lower Lounge of the International Centre from 2:30-4:30 pm and then at 8:00 pm will give a public lecture on the topic "Working in a Chinese Factory". The lecture in Dupuis Auditorium, will be a keynote address of China Week '77, organized by the Chinese Club.

Born in China in 1949, Mr. Crook was educated in Peking, where his parents worked as professors in the Institute of Foreign Languages. In 1966, three years before his high school graduation, the Cultural Revolution broke out. As did every student in China, Mr. Crook took an active part in the movement and became a Redguard. After graduating from high school, he was assigned work, first at a foundry for farm equipment and then at an automobile factory.

Mr. Crook left China in 1973 and went to England, where he worked eight months, before going to the United States. After studying at the University of Massachusetts, he obtained his M.A. in Education and returned to China in the summer of 1976. During a three-month stay he made a visit to Tibet. Mr. Crook was in Peking at the time of the earthquake. Mr. Crook is currently studying in the department of East Asian Studies at Stanford University.

Mr. Crook plans to talk about his visit to Tibet and discuss more general topics such as "The Cultural Revolution in China" during the informal discussion.

In his public lecture, Mr. Crook will concentrate on "the community nature of a Chinese Factory", "How crime is handled", "How workers take part in the administration of the factory," and "The workers attitude toward their work."

Outlook benefits

Dance raises $3000

Over $3,000 was pledged towards Camp Outlook at their Marathon Dance held in Grant Hall last Friday evening-Saturday morning. Grant Hall was fairly crowded in the early evening, but numbers dwindled as the hours progressed.

Live music entertained the weary dancers until about 4:30 am, coffee and doughnuts sustaining the energy levels.

Pledges are now being received in the Outlook Office on the second floor of the Student's Union, University Avenue entrance. All those who attended are asked to collect and return their pledges as soon as possible. A digital clock radio will be presented to the person who brings in the highest amount.

Camp Outlook is a student-run organization which takes children referred from schools and social agencies on week-end and 10 day trips to areas north of Kingston and some of the Provincial Parks. These children, for various reasons, would not normally have the opportunity of leaving Kingston during the summer. The operation is funded through private donations and government grants. The Marathon Dance, however, is the only direct appeal made to students. For example, this year a LIP grant was received to operate a Winter Camping Programme.

Queen's should take Elrond title -

Restructure mgmt.--report

by Rob Reynolds

The Elrond Review Committee has recommended that the college appeal to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation (CMHC) to extend the mortgage in order to help alleviate the financial woes of the college. In the eventuality that CMHC refuses to revise Elrond's mortgage payments then the committee recommends "that Queen's University assume title to the building."

The committee, consisting of Bill Young (Chairman), Peter Stokes and Don Altman of Elrond, Finn Bogstad and Wilma Bernabei of Queen's and Paul Steep of the AMS was convened in April of 1976, "to examine the management of the college. This proposal for restructuring presupposes, "that Queen's University will assume title to the building and assume formal responsibility for its financial and legal affairs." The report does go on to note, however, that "the restructuring proposal is not dependent on change of title," as "the Review Committee recommends consideration of the restructuring proposal even if Elrond College Inc. should retain ownership."

Although the report suggests that Queen's assume the ownership, Elrond would retain the management so as to maintain the college as a cooperative.

The need to renegotiate the mortgage with CMHC arises because they hold the first mortgage to Elrond. The second mortgage is held by Queen's and the third mortgage is held by the AMS.

The need for this committee arose out of the poor, short-term financial condition of the college which has, according to its reports "experienced deficits since its second year of operation." The report states that the accumulated cash and book reserve deficit as of April 30, 1976 stood at $394,404. For the fiscal year 1976-77 the cash deficit alone is estimated by the report to be $51,551.

Due to the recurring deficit situation the college has had to incur short term loans to obtain additional cash. Through borrowing money the college has incurred additional interest charges, which add to the overall debt.

Another problem experienced by the college resulting from the increasing cash shortfall is that, "it has not been possible to build up a financial reserve sufficient to cover the costs of major replacements such as elevators, plumbing, electrical etc."

Apparently no immediate end is seen for the deficit situation for as the committee reports "assuming current levels of occupancy and no radical increase in operating cost, recent financial projections, for the college suggest a continuing and intensifying need for operating loans for at least the next three years."

Before arriving at its recommendation to appeal to CMHC and to have Queen's assume ownership (and Elrond the management) the committee rejected four other options. They were: that Elrond College Inc. declare bankruptcy, foreclosure by the mortgage holder, Elrond operate as a university-style residence, and, continued ownership and operation by Elrond College.

One of the foundations of the committee's recommendations is a restructured management arrangement. The new structure would consist of a general council, a management committee and a program committee with a general manager as the principal operating officer. The Elrond College Council (to be distinguished from the existing council) would become responsible for the college's general operation. Members of the new council would consist of representatives from the AMS, from Elrond, from Queen's University, from the community and from the Alumni. The council would be served by the two major committees.

The Management Committee would be responsible for the business management aspects of the operation of Elrond. The Program Committee would maintain close liaison with members and neighborhoods of the college as well as dealing with major program responsibilities appropriate to them.

Arts Festival hosts Richler

"World famous in Canada"

by Ian Robinson

"Forget all about the words 'identity' and 'culture'; seek only excellence," said Mordecai Richler. He was speaking on the subject "The Writer as a Public Figure."

Describing his early years as an aspiring writer, Mr. Richler spoke of the attitudes prevalent during his youth in Canada "It was generally felt," he explained, "that the only thing for the talented to do was to graduate from Canada." The alternative was being "world famous in Canada" and unknown in the rest of the world.

Circumstances conspired against the serious aspect of his speech, however. He recalled telling some fellow students who had congregated in the pub (at Sir George Williams University) that he wanted to be a writer. "Their reaction," said Richler, "was the immediate and crushing rejoinder... 'at this moment, a section of the ceiling broke loose and rained upon the audience immediately in front of Richler.' 'The immediate and crushing rejoinder was, 'What, a Canadian writer?' he continued evidently unabashed.

Mr. Richler said he felt that the quality of Canadian writing and the opportunities for the young writer in Canada had improved, but he expressed little sympathy for a certain "poet who travels the Canadian University circuit" saying that "the best damn poetry in the world is written right here: It simply isn't so," he said, "The rest of the world does not have a tin ear."

Richler's portrayal of Irving Stone, author of biographies on Michaelangelo and Van Gogh was no less scathing. While together on a morning talk show, Stone had been drawing great applause with such lines as, "People read my books because they're about the human experience" and "I live all the characters in my books." Said Richler, "I don't know what magic he's done on his ceilings, but I'm willing to bet he didn't have an ear missing."

The Montreal born author of The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz and Saint Urbain's Horseman spoke at Dunning Auditorium on Tuesday evening as one of the two major speakers for the Arts Festival '77 week. Queen's was the last of a series of campuses at which he has spoken, on a recent promotion tour. Asked what he is working on now, he replied, "Ahh... a novel."

"The grey cartoon affair" Journal-G.W. set Feb. 5 as date for hockey showdown

by Our Best Reporter

"This is an outrage!" screamed Shelagh Hurley, Journal features editor as she stomped up and down on a photo of Golden Words co-editor Dan LePage. Hurley was reeling, of course, to the blatant disregard for the copyright laws displayed on the front page of the last edition of the G.W. A thinly disguised imitation of the editorial cartoon in Tuesday's Journal was unscrupulously published by the G.W. Wednesday.

"We're demanding an apology," said Associate editors Jude Byrne and Gerry Lewame in unison. "If we don't get one we may just have to settle this thing on a hockey rink."

When contacted by the Journal, Scoop Purdy, co-editor of G.W. told our reporters "We're very, very sorry, of course, and naturally we'll run a front page retraction and public apology next issue."

"I really didn't know you were going to run that cartoon. I thought I'd seen it in Playboy. I didn't know. Nope, not me. Nope."

"Oh, shut him up," muttered Journal passerpartout Jim Klein.

"Besides, I didn't think you'd mind," Purdy added, looking up.

"Actually, this whole thing's a hoax," disclosed Journal editor Terry Collins, "designed to get people to come to the Journal-G.W. hockey game on February 5th at 1:30 p.m."

Collins continued to suck out by saying "and we apologize to Richard Row for stealing his cartoon."

Canada Campus Notes

Bilingualism proposal for Phds

TORONTO [CUP] - A "very thorough and serious discussion" on the merits of making French a requirement for all doctoral programs will be undertaken by the University of Toronto's School of Graduate Studies (SGS) at the urging of the academic affairs committee.

The issue surfaced recently during the committee's consideration of routine requests for approval of several minor changes in Ph.D. requirements in library science.

The requirements currently require knowledge of a foreign language only "when a substantial part of the literature of a candidate's research area" is in that language.

But one professor expressed dismay that the requirements ignore that Canada has two official languages.

"I've been in this country ten years now, and I sometimes have to pinch myself and ask 'where am I?'" said Prof. Tom Langan.

"This is the highest degree in library science in a bilingual country," Langan said.

"The holders of this degree should at the very least be able to read two official languages."

SGS James Ham said the library policy was in line with recent trends in graduate studies.

"In my own experience, I have seen the requirements for other languages decrease from two to one to optional," he said.

"But the issue may well rebound to the point it was at when I was a student and I needed two other languages in engineering."

Several members of the committee, including university provost Donald Chant and president John Evans, expressed concern that the motion to refer back would hold up desirable changes sought in the policy, but not affect the current language policy.

As a result the committee settled on a motion approving the desired changes but "expresses concern" over the language requirement.

It asks the library science department to consider making French a Ph.D. requirement and asks SGS to consider it as a schoolwide policy.

York bars gay couples from apts.

TORONTO [CUP] - Gay couples at York University cannot rent furnished one-bedroom apartments on campus although the rooms are open to heterosexual couples, married or single.

According to residence manager Jane Corbett furnished apartments are covered by the regulation because they contain double beds.

Corbett's comments were contained in the December issue of a York feminist magazine, Breakthrough. She said she herself could not conceive of living in such close quarters with another woman.

Paul Trollope, a spokesperson for the Gay Alliance at York (GAY), said his group will protest to the York Housing Office, and ask them "to repudiate the existing policy and replace it with a clear one of non-discrimination."

The issue was raised after an application for a furnished apartment by Charlene Robertson, a third year women's studies student, was rejected. Corbett told her "two members of the same sex are not allowed to share a furnished one-bedroom apartment on campus." The application had been for Robertson and another woman she described as her lover.

"I don't know whether you call two people of the same sex a couple," said Corbett. She added that the graduate residences had been built primarily to accommodate married couples on campus.

"The apartments affected by the regulations comprise only 40 per cent of the ones in grad residences," Corbett said.

The other 60 per cent are available.

Robertson commented that a conversation with the residence manager "led us to believe that many other couples in the past had found themselves in our position, and had either taken a two-bedroom apartment or decided to commute rather than live on campus."

Dating service set up at UWO

LONDON [CUP] - In what appears to be a throwback to the days of blue chignon and the big prom the University of Western Ontario student council has set up a computerized dating service.

The service started Jan. 10 after a November council meeting narrowly approved the proposal 14-12.

"Of all my six years on council, I have never seen such a piece of crap," student board governors representative Rob Metras told that meeting.

Nevertheless the project is operational and "will be run in a business-like fashion" to ensure confidentiality according to council vice-president Steve Lichty.

Applicants will be asked to fill out a form containing 50 questions. The responses will be transferred to punch cards and fed into a computer. The cards will be matched and the applicant will get the name and number of his or her computer-chosen mate. Students must pay a one dollar application fee which is good for as many as ten dates according to council executive Larry Haskell. The entire $450 project is slated to run on a break-even basis.

Dunning Trust Lecturer

Valaskakis recommends that society rent, not own

by Jennifer Warren

Our consumer-oriented lifestyle is leading us towards a "squander society", in which non-renewable resources are being wasted forever. This is a major concern of Dr. Valaskakis, who proposes a viable alternative to this by way of a "consumer society".

The initial phase of the consumer society which Valaskakis outlined, would involve largely only a change in habits and therefore the policy options which have been devised could be applied immediately in the view of Dr. Valaskakis.

Dr. Valaskakis, the director of GAMMA, an interdisciplinary group advocating a transition to a more rational, efficient society, envisions the creation of a "circular economy". This would mean that raw materials could be transformed into products which could ultimately be recycled.

Economic growth could therefore be achieved without waste. Valaskakis terms this doing "more with less."

Central to the development of a consumer society is a conservationist technology, Valaskakis said. In other words renewable resources should be used such as solar or wind power, instead of depleting non-renewable resources, leading to a symbiotic relationship with nature, more man with nature than man against nature.

The GAMMA director also advocated persuading industries by incentives to cut pollution, and to recycle, by making it profitable. This could be realized through "full cost pricing" which would reflect such costs as those caused by pollution control, for example, as well as other reports and articles. Valaskakis stressed the importance that Canadians be made to understand the nature of their position, and then after the present reckless direction in favour of the consumer society.

Kimon Valaskakis has British and French law degrees and a PhD in economics from Cornell University. He has taught over ten years at Cornell University, Sir George Williams University and at the University of Montreal, and has been a research associate and consultant for various agencies. Valaskakis has published two books on economic development as well as a number of other reports and articles.

New exec wants a stable AMS

In an interview with The Journal, the newly acclaimed AMS executive team of Christie, Howe and Button proposed answers to some of the problems facing their upcoming administration.

In considering the amount of influence the AMS can exert over financial constraints, and where money should go, Christie felt that "the most important thing is to sustain the impression that the AMS is a responsible student voice. Once that credibility is established, through talking to the Senate, the board of Trustees, the Principal, the lines of communication that are open to us, student priorities can be worked into the university's priorities as a whole." Howe pointed out that though students have little say on how the university spends its money "certainly the administration and faculty are more willing to listen to student opinions. We can make representation and be fairly confident they'll be kept in mind when decisions are made about where the money is going".

In attempting to ascertain whether the credibility of the team is diminished by an acclamation, Button said "certainly an election is much healthier, but we said from the beginning that no matter what happened we would get out to the people anyways. We're in a more difficult position, but we're prepared to work a lot harder."

Christie felt that the policies of the team are "not so rigid that if we come up against mass opposition we can't change them. Once an election campaign is called, policies become rigid, they're blocked in with a slate." Howe pointed out that acclamation does not mean the new executive can do anything they like, because "there is still Outer Council which has to put its seal of approval on our policy either through the approval of budget and how we're allocating it, or on direct policy questions."

When asked about plans for generating student interest in the AMS, Howe felt that students should feel free to come to the AMS office and ask "What's happening... They would allow us to make the issues known... Anybody can come in and tell us what they think about a particular issue and we'll see how we can develop it into policy. You don't have to be on Council to get involved or make your opinion known."

Button felt that "the more successful we are at making contacts, the more successful we'll be in dealing with the students." Christie noted that "last year the Ontario Federation of Students was run by one person... this year we've (the AMS Outer Council) sent far more people to conferences, so instead of one person talking about it, we've now got a dozen or a dozen and a half... NSD too, was a terrific step forward. Maybe we didn't get 10,000 people, but those that did go talked about it. Now that NSD had been held, the next step is easier."

The team feels that this year's executive has done a good job; there is very little they would attempt to change. Christie felt that "much of what has been termed apathy stems from the fact that it was a year with so few mysteries and intrigues. A job well done does not have the appeal of a Watergate or a Gray Affair." Howe referred to the fact that the present executive members "haven't really been challenged by Council, so the difficult thing to determine is whether council agrees with them all the time or if Council simply isn't playing up to the role they should be."

In attempting to get people involved, Christie said they would keep in mind places where people might get involved—"If we can only make it easy enough and make it understood that everyone has a right, and possibly an obligation to get involved, then we'll get that involvement."

In defining the role of a Vice President of University Affairs, Button cited two of her major interests as differential fees, and OSAP. She felt that she would "have to have a good sense of what was going on in OFS, and NUS, and all external matters. Part of my job will be involvement with the Senate on academic development committee so I would have to have a good sense of new policies, and what was going on. The two major areas of the job are political and academic. I've worked with the community and I have a good sense of external affairs." In talking about the role of liaison with the students as part of her job, Button felt "the Journal would be the focal point of relations with the students, so it's in our best interests to maintain a good relationship".

Regarding internal policies, Button reported the team was planning on looking into student interest fees. Christie added "there has to be an ongoing evaluation of the services. The parts I would see us paying most attention to are the pub, the Housing Service, and especially to the student fee. It's very high, one of the highest in Canada". Howe pointed out "the level of funding for clubs is inadequate. There are 41 registered clubs, and 30 ask for funds. $2800 between 30 clubs doesn't go very far. We'd see if we could divert more money into the clubs". Christie summed up the policy on services by saying that "we see the absolute importance of the services, and it's not that we're not interested in the services, it's just that we take them for granted, because they've had so many good people involved," noting particularly the work of QSA director Gord Hines.

Queen's Journal

editorial opinion

Our vote for the NUS

Queen's students would be well advised to vote in favour of joining the National Union of Students (NUS) when presented with the opportunity of doing so on the referendum scheduled for February 9th and 10th.

"NUS is Us" is the promotional platitude offered by supporters of the organization. Is this accurate? Queen's has come out against such things as the principle of free tuition, support for the Canadian Labour Congress on October 14th Day of Protest and in favour of differential fees for foreign students. We would certainly be voicing minority viewpoints as a member of the NUS as has been the case in the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS).

For this reason there is probably considerable cynicism towards our participation in another student federation. Yet, whether we feel at odds with such positions or whether we support them, it is nonetheless important for us to make our views known at the national level. Not only would we benefit by being exposed to other points of view, it is not inconceivable that the converse will hold.

In more concrete terms, our membership in NUS will give us access to the considerable research material accumulated by the organization on such issues as student unemployment, housing, taxation and tuition fees. Moreover, it is the research undertaken by NUS in areas of close concern, which has made the group a formidable lobbying force. For example, NUS has been credited with having played a significant role in persuading the federal government to re-establish a summer employment programme for students, this one called Young Canada Works which is expected to provide an estimated 100 jobs in the Kingston area this year.

We maintain that Queen's membership in NUS might prove beneficial in a broader sense as well. Student enthusiasm for the representation of their interests at the local provincial and national levels will only arise if the students are first clearly informed on the issues and then encouraged to present their views. Certainly students need leadership, but such leadership should not impose policies or ideological perspectives upon its constituents.

NUS, by inaugurating the concept, and supervising the administration of National Student's Day, has demonstrated its commitment to a liaison with students on fundamental issues such as the role of the University in our society.

Can culture be legislated? — Periferal visions by David Gay

We are told that the cultural climate in Canada today is more encouraging to embryonic artists than at any other time in our brief history. This is partly due to the governments' response to the problem of national unity. During the recent wave of nationalism, the government passed legislation designed to encourage artists to give us a clearer sense of our heritage.

Canadian content regulations and Canada Council grants were established and the CBC adopted a new jingle, "Bringing Canadians Together", which is meant to reflect the government's cultural philosophy. This is combined with the work of academics who endlessly scrutinize and theorize the haphazard patterns and mentalities in Canadian literature. It would not surprise me if someday someone wrote a book applying differential calculus to the study of our literature.

In any event, it is becoming clear that the artist's search for a national identity and the government's quest for national unity are not necessarily compatible goals in a country like Canada. The eleven decades of our national existence have been a rapid, technological blur. When nothing is the same from one moment to the next it is impossible for an artistic tradition to take root, although many separate works of art can be produced. We are also an ethnic mosaic and it is impossible for an average student at Queen's to understand why young French Canadian writers such as Michel Tremblay forbade the translation of their works into English until a separatist government was elected in Quebec.

This sort of approach leads to T-shirts and posters and is fine for rock music but very bad for literature. Rock music is an industry and I hope it won't hurt your feelings when I tell you that Mick Jagger and the Beach Boys are not now, nor have they ever been artists. That is why it is sad to see true artists being promoted that way. Can you picture a cigar-smoking promoter saying "Listen kid, your poem is great but it's just not what the kids are listening to this year." That is probably already happening; how else can you explain Harlequin Romances and pornography (I'm not sure which is more obscene).

Although the quest for cultural unity has backfired slightly and led to some frightening realizations, I am sure the mission of the artist will continue. However, there has been one very disturbing result of this new cultural climate. This was pointed out by Mordecai Richler on Tuesday night. He said that publishers are now sending writers out on the road to peddle themselves on the radio and the Johnny Carson show. This reminded me of an ad I saw in Publisher's Weekly which said that so-and-so is the most exciting poet since Leonard Cohen and is now available on such-and-such a label. It was accompanied by the same sort of semi-candid, groovy-looking photos you see on album covers.

Still I am not pessimistic. It is good that the government is encouraging our artists as long as it is prepared for the results. Artists always come out of the blue anyways, whether we are ready for them or not. What I am pessimistic about is an artistic tradition. If Keats or Byron were born today they would probably become quite famous, but it is unlikely a Romantic rebellion would occur. This is another consequence of the stratified suburban society we live in. This electronic incubator will no doubt hatch a great many artists in its nest, but it would be a miracle if a family were produced. Then again, that may not be anything to worry about, unless of course you are a politician or a professor.

Cagers' coaching draws praise

Dear Editor:

Without good teachers and committed students the laboratories of Miller Hall, the stacks of Douglas Library and the seminar rooms of Mackintosh-Corry would be sterile areas of aimless assembly instead of centers of occasionally passionate learning. So with the broad expanse of the basketball court in the main gymnasium, on which the focus of activity in the past has all too often been the comical cavoring of the overaged, the undersized, the malconditioned and the uncoordinated, all engaged in the relentless pursuit of fantasy and diversion. "Recreation", we call it.

All this may be changing. The fine back to back performances of the men's basketball team last week suggests that new heroes are about to appear. Queen's characteristic looping, cross-court (-country!) pass has become a crisp 6 foot bounce pass; rebounding, formerly a casual, leisure time activity for those who couldn't make a basket anyway, now seems to be geared to ripping a basket or head from the backboard or body, respectively; guards may bounce the ball, forwards and centers may not; the player with the hot hand, not the one who happens to have his hands on the ball, gets to shoot; the individually meek have collectively become street fighters on defence; players react to a loose ball on the floor the way Mean Joe Greene reacts to unattended quarterback. My main concern is no longer whether Queen's will win but whether they will kill somebody in the process. This is one tough team. It will probably still experience its share of losses when it is not shooting well, for it is shy on numbers, depth, experience and polished talent. But unless these two games are not a true indicator of character, it is not a team which will concede points or games easily.

A fellow with the improbable name of Smith is largely responsible for initiating this transformation from pussycat to tiger, for converting the main gymnasium from a place where one not only can escape from the pressures of the university but also observe in operation the primary activity of the university. For in public Coach Smith does what every professor tries to do in the privacy of his classroom: namely, communicate his knowledge, love and enthusiasm for his subject to a group of students who can only gradually combine with their natural ability, new knowledge, skills and discipline. To make such a process work, it takes considerable commitment and ability on the part of both teacher and student, coach and player. That the process has worked for Smith and Company, however enduring that success might be, is a praiseworthy accomplishment and a notable contribution to the life of the university as a whole. Thank you Mr. Smith; welcome to the teaching staff of Queen's University.

Dear Editor:

I write to substantiate a letter concerning Psychology 235 published in last week's Journal. I carry a first-class average in one of the more demanding departments here and took this course because it appeared to be an interesting introduction to Psychology. My mark on the first mid-term was not "devastating" but was still the lowest that I have received so far in any department. From what I can judge, most people in the class were floored, and with some justification. Class averages in the low 50's are simply inexplicable except in terms of either unduly harsh marking or the professor's inability to adequately communicate the material. Our professor for the first section communicated quite well — indeed he was, by all accounts, truly enlightening.

Let me construct a possible scenario. Students were flocking to take the course [it is, or at least should be by virtue of the subject matter, more palatable than some]. Marks were fairly high for a couple of years. A test from above was applied to "tighten things up". To compensate, then, this year the pendulum has obviously swung too far in the other direction. Possibly this is the doing of wounded professional "ego" (with apologies to Freud). Possibly the markers are intellectually insecure, their only academic qualifications being that they have been here longer than myself.

In any case, with 40 percent or more now failing, the department has doubtless achieved academic credibility. Well done, guys! Those without tenure had better beware, though—without any students you may well be looking for jobs next year. You will have won the Pyrrhic victory.

A second look at the referendum

by Jim Klein

From time to time every columnist succumbs to suicidal urges and writes about politics. Whether theory or practice be his subject, the emotional progression is the same. First come the hesitant, trembling moments before the paper goes off to press and it's finalized, there's no retracting the piece. If there are no angry letters within the next two issues, you've got away with it.

You've escaped criticism so well, in fact, that you wonder if anybody read the article. Locke and Rousseau are still selling briskly over at the bookstore...so you try again.

This being acclamation (pardon me, election) time, I'd like to look once more at what passes for politics on campus — in particular, the use of the almighty referendum. Once before I was very critical of rule by referendum, calling it "Gallup-poll Government." Now that I rethink, however, I wish I could rewrite the article — not so much because of its turgidity, but simply because this referendum process so often outshines its alternatives.

The referendum is plainly flawed. It determines the best, the truest, or the most moral choice on the basis of which choice is preferred by the most voters. There is nothing basically wrong with saying "option A is best if most people who vote choose to vote for option A." However, substitute "the sun circles the earth" for "option A" and you have a recipe for a return to the dark ages — substitute "convicted killers should be shot and let me help," and you have the constitution of the state of Utah. It seems the referendum has limited usefulness, then, in scientific and moral problems. Unfortunately, politics sometimes deals with exactly those types of problems.

In outlining the alternatives, though, I find myself starting with the "dictum-from-above" approach. Here, the conclusion is known from the start, and the politics lies in finding the reasons why. Divine inspiration used to provide the answers, but GOD has, of late, taken a back seat to such as OFS and, yes, CUP.

Clearly this is a strange and prejudiced process which does not so much escape logic as never has come within reach. A hybrid of this school of thought is known as "Afghani politics" — or the "let's-protest-strip-mining-in-Surinam-while-campus-services-go-down-the-tube" philosophy. Presently this thinking dominates editors whose papers never hit the street, and presidents who don't get invited back to see Dr. Parrott.

One other alternative political theory, not so prevalent on campuses, might be called logical laissez-faire-ism. Faced with new option A, the thinking follows these lines: if A were best, the administration would be encouraging it. The administration isn't encouraging it, thus it must not be best. Henceforth, the said administration doesn't pursue option A, and the world continues to unfold as it should. Fortunately, campuses are usually spared these impenetrable arguments — they mostly influence the defence budgeting of peanut republics.

Which brings us back to the referendum approach, and the phase where columnists moralize a bit so they can say "I told you so" later on. That would be good fun, but I'd sooner politicize in the remaining space.

Weak as they are, referendum votes such as the coming NUS question are often the individual student's most effective voice in student government. If you care at all, you can vote — if you don't vote, you can only regret it later. Another way to have your say is to buttonhole (a la Parliamentary reporter) an Outer Council member and give him an earful. Talking to students conducting a yearlong referendum is his job, whether he knows it or not.

"Sense of social responsibility" leads reader to defend Bus-it

Dear Editor:

In light of the current busing controversy, I think this is an appropriate time for us to question ourselves as to the type of society we envision and whether our actions contribute to or detract from such an ideal. I feel compelled by a sense of social responsibility to enter into the debate. I, for no other reason but that we extract ourselves from our narrow focus and examine what has transpired so far. I tender that the flagrant misrepresentation of the facts which have characterized the issue have done nothing but to cloud the true issue.

Permit me to be philosophical even if I sound like a voice crying in the wilderness. I want to urge that we look at the issue not with blind emotionalism but with a sense of reason. I would like after this issue would have been resolved — whatever the outcome — that an ex post facto assessment would find us not guilty of unreasonable action.

Let me point out a few of the benefits, both tangible and intangible, that the Bus-It program has conferred upon us.

Firstly the program is a milestone in demonstrating the ability of the AMS to cooperate with the PUC. Due to the frequent bus rides the tension between students — 90 percent of whom are not native Kingstonians — and residents of Kingston is considerably reduced.

Secondly the Bus-It program is an incentive to ride the bus. This ameliorates substantially the congestion and parking problems which would otherwise result if Queen's students were to drive to lectures.

Thirdly, there is no question that it reduces the pressure to acquire housing nearer to the University.

Those arguments although not new should not be rejected outright. We have to remember that these are real benefits which occur to all members of the Kingston area.

This brings me to another important point. Of all people Queen's students should be the last to raise questions about equity. The argument that only a small percentage — estimated at 20 percent — of students ride the buses, demonstrate our concern for our fellow students.

I wish to ask those who advance such an argument, where are their moral consciences? To me the idea of a cooperative society should begin here — at the doorstep of the university. It is here that ideas should be nurtured and transplanted into society at large. Isn't one of the

Dear Editor:

With regard to a recent letter to the Journal perhaps a few corrections are in order. The writer states that "I would like to remind the Queen's community that the LFRS is a society, just as Artsci is, or Commerce, or Applied Science, again so is the WRC." Artsci is not a society. The society representing Arts and Science students is the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society (or A.S.U.S.). functions of the university to help in moulding a new type of society? Yet at the crunch we have these advocates abdicating their cherished responsibility. What a shame! I hope that when the AMS and the PUC reconvenes their negotiations, they should meet in a spirit of cooperation. Let us bury the old societal image of man in conflict and demonstrate a spirit of harmony.

You too can be well-rounded!

All too often in the hustle-bustle of life at Queen's we tend to overlook the little happenings that can make us more rounded individuals.

Cruising through the latest edition of the Queen's Gazette, a few students might have missed the announcement that next Wednesday Dr. Humber of the Beyer Research Laboratories will be addressing the topic: "Chemistry of the Benzocycloheptapyridosquinolines: A Case History of the Development of a New Antipsychotic Agent". Britain's Open University

'Open' but selective

by Hugh Dodd

"No university in the world has ever established an academic and teaching reputation so quickly," says the London Observer about the Open University. The Open University, conceived by Harold Wilson's Labour government, has been teaching students since 1971. The Observer continues, "It is an astonishing story of an educational success... The pass rates of its students have exceeded expectations."

This success has been achieved by the Open University despite the many established ideas of what a university should be like in Britain. Over the past century, comparative smallness and high selectivity have been the major characteristics of a typical British University. Specialized degree courses have been concentrated over a short period of time in these institutions.

In contrast, the Open University does not ask for any entry qualifications at all. Students are taught throughout Britain in the convenience of their own homes. In order to accumulate credits, the student may take a flexible timetable of courses, spanning several regions of academic endeavour. Those credits toward a degree may be earned at each student's own pace. Two years or ten years is suitable for completion, as the student wishes.

However, despite the success in the educational field, a persistent and problematic question has been raised: Is the Open University educating the right people?

No large numbers of working class applicants have been attracted to the University. Of those who enter the ranks of the Open University, the survival rate is relatively low. As it turns out, the Open University is primarily a middle class establishment. One eighth of the students are professional men and women, one tenth are housewives and one third are teachers.

Sir Walter Perry, Vice Chancellor of the University, submits that few OU students are of working-class status now, (a status which is determined by their occupation). However, he also asserts that two-thirds of them originate from working-class backgrounds. This status is judged by their parent's type of work.

Consequently a convincing argument may present that the OU has not moved people up from the bottom of the social ladder. However, for those who are already socially mobile, it has provided the extra shove. Staff of the OU say that a man who left school at 15 to join the labour force, and worked there for 18 years is inherently unlikely to be interested in enrolling for an OU course.

Does the OU really have anything to offer working Britons? For those men and women needing a second chance in education the OU has assumed that an academic degree course is the answer. Yet most of Britain's working class dropped out of school well before the beginning of university, at ages 15 to 16. The second chance that they need is to obtain qualifications at the sub-degree level—not at the Open University, but at an open high school.

In order to take an OU course, the

Sir Walker Perry

the Open University's vice chancellor vast majority of working people would have to take some form of preparatory course. The OU was initially reluctant to become involved with work of a sub-degree nature for fear of jeopardizing its academic reputation, according to the Observer. However, once its reputation became more secure, the OU seemed prepared to re-examine its attitude.

The OU extends its operation into other areas, such as post-experience education. This concept consists of strongly vocational courses, which are meant to bring the students up to date with the latest developments in their occupations. In 1973, courses on the Common Market, environmental control, public health and industrial relations were among those being planned.

Within four years of its conception the OU had established itself among the British institutions of higher education. Its course materials have been utilized by other university departments as textbooks. Through the OU the possibilities of radio and television have been revealed to the academic community.

The major problem of the Open University is the lack of personal contact among students and between students and teachers. Although summer schools are compulsory, the experience of an academic setting is limited. Study centres offer the students the chance to exchange ideas and obtain help from counsellors. However, some of these centres are not used to their best advantage. Problems intensify as

by Stephen Campbell

This year will mark the 5th year that co-ed residence has existed on the central Campus at Queen's. Morris Hall was converted to a co-ed residence in 1972 and is today a thriving entity in the residence environment. Not only does its existence provide physical proof that mixed residences are a viable alternative to the traditional all-male or all-female residence, but also that mixed residences are a more desirable alternative.

It is often said that a post-secondary education in our university system is not 100 percent academic study; the social interactions play a vital role in preparing the individual to survive in the conditions of the outside world. The more the environment at university reflects the environment of the real world, the better will be the preparation.

I suggest that the mixed environment in a co-ed residence better reflects the real world than does the segregated environments of the all-male or all-female residences, and therefore co-ed residences are a better alternative.

Co-ed Morris is in many ways similar to the segmented residences, it is after all only a place to live. There is no denying that it, like all other residences has its loud parties and its noisy times. Yet there exists a marked difference in the atmosphere in Morris.

It is hard to pinpoint just what it is. Perhaps it is that with the people who live around you at Morris you have the chance to view someone of the opposite sex as a person, in a fashion similar to that of a brother sister relationship. Having both males and females living in the same environment tends to relax the sexual difference between males and females: you are just people. Interaction between males and females at Morris does not take place under the 'formal' conditions that people from the other residences find themselves; at a dance, at the pub, a meal at Leonard. You learn to relax in a mixed crowd and to take people for what they are. It is a natural, real world environment.

The absence of brother-sister floor raids at Morris, which results from the artificial segregation in the other residences, gives Morris the lowest maintenance costs of all the residences. Eight hundred girls isolated in a single building with males being admitted by escort only is not a situation reflected in any real world environment, save perhaps that of a prison.

If co-ed residences do provide for a better social preparation for the real world, why then are only 180 of 2000 places in the central residences at Queen's offered as co-ed? Why is Queen's so far behind other respected universities such as Western and Guelph, whose residences are nearly all co-ed?

I feel that the answer lies with tradition. Queen's is unquestionably a conservative university and has a great deal of emphasis placed on tradition. In past decades people who have lived in residences at Queen's have lived in all-male or all-female environments. Spirit in residence is high, people invariably have a good time. Parents who graduated from Queen's and are now sending their own children here, recall their own experience at residence and channel their children into the residences they went through: either all-male or all-female. The circle is unfortunately continuous and students' views and attitudes towards co-ed residences once they have been in a segregated one are not often favourable. Any proposals to convert Chown or McNeill to co-ed are not supported by the majority of people in the segregated residences.

People's conceptions of what a co-ed residence is like are on the most part based not on their own experiences, but rather on hearsay. Once people have experienced a co-ed residence or have talked to people in a co-ed residence, their attitudes towards the co-ed system become more positive.

To provide students at Queen's with an opportunity to see for themselves what co-ed residences are all about, Morris Hall will be holding an Open House this weekend (28th-29th January). An open invitation is extended to all who are interested to attend the social events planned for the weekend: the Party on Friday, and Coffee House on Saturday. Those specifically interested in Co-ed Morris as a place to live next year may pick up an application form and an information booklet on Saturday from 11:00 a.m. to 3:00 p.m. in the Morris Hall centre common room. The building will be open to all who wish to look around, and any Morris resident will be willing to answer any questions that you may have.

The issue of further co-ed residences will undoubtedly be the subject of a referendum in the future. We encourage people to take this opportunity to get a true picture of co-ed living and we hope that a future vote will reflect the true value of co-ed residences as the better alternative.

Queen's
Journal
Vol 100, No 7
Tues, Oct 1, 1977
Queen's University
at Kingston Ont

This article appeared in the QUEEN'S JOURNAL in late 1972. Morris is still the success it was 5 years ago.

Coed residence is working well

by Sue de Stein

"This is a community, not a residence," remarked Morris Hall residents Steve Brereton and Santiago Collado.

The success of co-ed Morris can be shown by the development of a very strong community spirit among its residents in only three weeks. In most men's and women's residences at Queen's, such spirit can generally only be found after Christmas.

There have been many community efforts and floor projects begun in Morris, some involving the decoration of the much-used common rooms, the organization of a laundry service, and the provision for a Sunday brunch.

Dr. M. Griffin, Warden of Morris Hall, stated that the "enthusiasm among residents of Morris Hall has been terrific."

"The spirit and cheerleading abilities of Morris Hall residents was in evidence at an inter-residence football game last week when upper Leonard defeated Morris Hall. There was no lack of spectator support; the turn-out from Morris was astounding," according to J. Johnson, a don.

Many Morris Hall residents have observed that the ideas and opinions that non-Morris residents have about life in co-ed residence are generally misconceptions.

In the opinion of Rick Janes, life in co-ed is "calmer, easier, and more civilized than life in a men's residence." The atmosphere in Morris is relaxed and friendly. Doors are left open and unlocked. A willingness to share and cooperate, and a respect for other residents are found in Morris Hall. The style of living in Morris seems to be remarkably different from that in other Queen's residences.

A great deal of the success of co-ed Morris can be attributed to the original planning of alternating the rooms between the men and women. The West Campus co-ed residences are planned in blocks of men and women and have not experienced as yet, a true community spirit. The planning of Morris allows for more personal contact among men and women residents.

Two thirds of Morris Hall residents are first year students, the other third, upperclassmen. First year men and women have played a much larger role in creating community spirit in Morris and in its organization than was expected. On Monday all Morris Hall residents, regardless of year, were able to run for positions on the House Council which is the governing body of Morris. This council is separate from both the IRC and the WRC.

Steve Brereton remarks that in Morris there is "no stigma attached to dating." The social life in Morris is very relaxed... Here the "opposite sex is treated as a human being."

Brereton is not alone in his wish to see the co-ed residence project expanded. He views Morris Hall as "an excellent change from the traditional residences."

Some defend "Your Own Thing.." We ask for fair reviews

Dear Editor:

I write to correct a most inaccurate and prejudicial preview story which appeared in the 18 January Journal concerning the Department of Drama's production of Your Own Thing.

Rather than honestly previewing the production—informing the university community about the show—your correspondent (Ms. Liz Wood) criticized the play itself without ever having seen or read it! Even in a review a critic has no right to attack a production merely because she happens to dislike the genre of the play. Furthermore, your correspondent both misquoted me and twisted what I did say to draw several nasty implications. It's no wonder that this poor piece of journalism ran without her byline. The most egregious errors include:

"there wasn't a disco scene in the late 1960's". In fact many discotheques such as Cheetah in New York, Syringe in San Francisco, and Clear Heaven in Baltimore were operating as early as 1965.

"it was not well received by critics or hippies". In fact Your Own Thing was very well received by critics and audiences alike; it ran for 2 years in New York, one in Toronto. Real "hippies" never went into any theatre, whatever the show.

.while others found the play a true disaster

Dear Editor:

We are greatly disturbed after having witnessed a true disaster which hit the stage Thursday, January 20th. At approximately 8:30 it began and 'progressed' late into the evening at a breakneck pace.

A rock opera entitled Your Own Thing set in the 1960's and based on Shakespeare's Twelfth Night was the piece performed. The selection of such a script seems inconceivable for one of the three major productions the Queen's Drama Department performs annually. The text of this play exhibited an offensive attitude which was largely supported by a variety of lines of questionable taste. This forces one to contemplate the integrity of not only the director, but also of the department involved.

Your Own Thing was a challenge to the audience's endurance, and a must for masochists. The abysmal choreography, misaimed spot lights, and poor set gave the audience an understanding as to why the actors lacked the vitality needed for this production. No wonder they thudded and thumped their ways through their failing routines.

Rosemary Lucas, Jane Northey
Sara Perry, Jennifer Zeitz

"I was not well received by critics or hippies". In fact Your Own Thing was very well received by critics and audiences alike; it ran for 2 years in New York, one in Toronto. Real "hippies" never went into any theatre, whatever the show.

-Hair as produced on Broadway and on tour in Toronto was not "a more accurate reflection of early hippiedom". As pointed out in last year's excellent Rolling Stone article, no one unified world of "hippiedom" ever existed. The Broadway and Toronto productions of Hair to which Ms. Wood refers had gone through 2 drastic revisions of book, music, actors, and directors. It started downtown at the New York Shakespeare Festival as a simple anti-war rock play; it transferred to Cheetah, a midtown discotheque, where the orchestrations subsumed the book; finally it transferred to Broadway where gimmicky staging techniques were added. This Hair had nothing to do with either the original play or with what was happening in the streets. It was and remains a good, brash Broadway musical comedy. Your Own Thing was and remains a very sincere and moving off-Broadway rock love story.

- I never said "there is a real west coast sound to the music". Rather I pointed out that the composer effectively integrates the rock and theatrical musical idioms.

- What "surprised" me about the cast was not (as Ms. Wood meanly implied) the high standard of performance that was reached, but rather that this cast reached a high level of performance so easily, quickly, and with so much fun. In short I was and remain delighted that I was able to cast such talented performers.

Finally and most important, I hope that the Queen's community will be able to see through your correspondent's prejudiced dark glasses and that it will come to Convocation Hall to judge for itself how good a show Your Own Thing is.

Bernard Burkum
Assistant Professor, Drama Dept.

Dear Editor:

So your reviewer, Donald Rayko, does not like the script of Your Own Thing, and fails to understand its deliberate tampering with Shakespeare. He could have gotten that much merely from reading it. Did he use his eyes? For he hardly conveys a sense of the production: the set, the costumes, choreography, the use of slides (several of which gave the actors' names in lieu of a printed programme - information which he conveniently distorted). He says little, furthermore, about the acting. In short, he pays almost no attention to production values.

Mr. Rayko played his clever tricks with his review of The Cherry Orchard, as well. We do not ask for good reviews, only fair ones, and we certainly think decent reviewing should offer something better than the reviewer demonstrating his smartness at the expense of others.

I hope members of the Queen's community will not be dissuaded by Mr. Rayko's slash, but will come and enjoy the production as last week's audiences did.

Murice Breslow
Director of Drama

Bothered by Rayko's cynicism

Dear Editor,

I have just read Donald Rayko's review of the Drama Department's production of Your Own Thing in Tuesday's Journal, and find myself forced to take issue with it. Having not yet viewed the play, I am not pretending to defend its merits; what disturbs me is the reviewer's attitude towards the production. I look to a newspaper critique to provide me with certain things other than the author's indulgence in some sort of attempted literary stage play.

Is it too much to ask for an opinion on the acting, ability of the players, the music, its lyrics and the expertise of the group, without all this drivel? Do we have to bear all this trite theatricality such as "(Oops! I think I used that word already)" and "Sit on it. Fonzie—these were the good old days."?

But it is Mr. Rayko's cynicism which bothers me the most; for instance the dig terming the students and staff who performed "nameless" because he received no program. I would have thought a reviewer worth his salt would have talked to the Director if he was really interested.

Another example: the snide comment that even if the sound system made some voices unintelligible, it didn't matter to the actors because they knew what they were saying, implying that this was all they were concerned about.

Actually, I would not have written this letter at all had the same dismissive sarcasm not persisted even after Mr. Rayko said, "Seriously now folks, on the positive side," and then proceeded to write "Two of the three other members of the rock group Charlie joins, can sing, and one can almost dance." Then the reviewer concludes, "Anyway it's the kind of thing you can take your mother to." Just what is this supposed to mean?

"Why bother with all this excessive rhetoric, Mr. Rayko?" I would greatly appreciate an informative review rather than some sort of attempt at a "hep-cat" critique.

Queen's Choral Ensemble concert - this Saturday...

Promises to be a memorable evening

Denise Narcisse-Mair will conduct the hundred and twenty voice Queen's Choral Ensemble in a performance in Grant Hall on Saturday, 29 January, beginning at 8:30 p.m.

The programme, because of its strongly contrasting styles, calls for much dexterity on the part of the singers and ability to adapt appropriately to the temper and flavour of each work. Purcell's 'Rejoice in the Lord Alway', F.R.C., Clarke's 'Resurrexi', Britten's 'Balu-laloo', (this latter taken from the 'Ceremony of Carols') and scored for female voices and is presented as a tribute by the choir to the recently deceased composer), and Healey Willan's 'Gloria Deo Per Immensa Saecula', precede what is thought to be the first performance in Kingston of Mozart's 'Coronation Mass in C Major K.V. 317'.

Mozart completed this Mass in 1779, purportedly in honour of the annual celebration of the coronation of the miraculous image of the Virgin Mary on the Maria-Plain near Salzburg. The basically operatic quality of this Mass is very evident throughout the work and the interplay between the four soloists, sometimes singing in quartet, and the chorus, emphasizes this quality. The soloists are: Rosemary Cairns, soprano; Stephanie Pickard, alto;

Queen's Choral Ensemble as it will appear this Saturday in Grant Hall.

Trevor Houle, tenor and Dale Mieske, bass. Queen's Chamber Orchestra provide the orchestral accompaniment for this stirring work.

Climaxing what promises to be a really memorable evening, is a performance, certainly a first in Kingston, of Norman Luboff's 'African Mass'. The ethnic influence is clearly evident in the ritualistic approach to this setting of the Mass with its strongly rhythmic use of the African idiom. The sole accompaniment of the voices by timpani and drums is so integrated in the structure of the whole that the percussion ceases to be mere accompaniment but becomes the pulsating heart of the performance.

Queen's Choral Ensemble, will participate by invitation in the Inter-Varsity Choral Festival next month, an annual event of some twenty-five years' standing, in the course of which they will sing alone, as well as with the massed choirs of the Universities of Toronto, McMaster, Western, Waterloo and Windsor. The Ensemble has also won by audition, the distinction of participating in the auspicious competitive 'Festival of Nations' in Washington at the John F. Kennedy Centre in May of this year.

Queen's Choral Ensemble has for the past five years been directed by Denise Narcisse-Mair, who arranged the drumming patterns for the 'African Mass' herself, drawing on her own expertise and knowledge of ritualistic drumming. Admission to the Saturday evening concert is free.

Q.M.T.'s "Dames" tap-dances on the water and...

Overcomes its weaknesses with panache

by Donald Rayko

Can a pair of stage-struck kids from Centerville, Utah, hit the 'Big Time' on the 'Great White Way'? You bet they can. Just ask any Ruby Keeler-Dick Powell fan. Or drop by the Grand Theatre and catch Queen's Musical Theatre's production Dames at Sea to see how it's done.

When apple pie-eyed Ruby gets off the bus from Utah with nothing but a pair of tapshoes in her suitcase and a song in her heart, and when her path crosses that of the very sailorboy who bought an eskimo-pie from her back in the Centerville drugstore, and when you learn that he writes songs, you just know that this star-crossed pair is going to make it to the very top. After all, isn't that the American Way?

It sure as heck is. By golly.

It's a spoof. And director Bruce Kyle and his company are doing their best to play it for all its potential risibilities. You've seen this show scores of times already. The Big Broadway Star: torrid, temperamental Mona Kent, sets her snares for Dick and his hit songs. Ruby thinks she has lost Dick, but through the timely trickery of Dick's best friend, Lucky, and Ruby's faithful confidante, Joan, Mona becomes seasick aboard the ship where the show is to be performed; Ruby steps into the gaping breach and she saves the show. Naturally, Ruby becomes a 'Big Star'. Ruby and Dick get married. Lucky and Joan get married. Even Mona and the captain of the ship get married. Happy, happy, happy.

In the midst of all that Kyle, musical director Judith Bourne, and choreographers Sandra Aitken and Catherine Brouse, together with the cast, do some send-ups of Fred Astaire, Anne Miller, Julie Andrews, and more famous and unforgettable hoofers and tweeters than you can shake a top hat or a walking stick at. It's the kind of show that, if it's done with enough zest and panache, will be fun despite its technical flaws. And it is.

Wendy Crewson, in the part of Mona, has a romp with her comely role, and belts out one song, "That Mister Man of Mine," well enough to kindle anyone's torch. Elizabeth Scott's Ruby and Ted Simonett's Dick can deliver as ingenious a "gee whiz" as any other pair of kids between here and Hooterville. Playing Lucky, George Pothitos does some very competent hoofing, as does Eric Hughes, in the part of the ship's captain, and Ralph Peter and Marg Rappolt support well in their roles.

The show's big plus is dancing. Brilliantly garish choreography in big production numbers carries the show. Without it, this already brief musical would be almost nonexistent. And tiresome. The big minus is music. The pit band is insipid and most of the time the vocalists are so weak and so far off key that they would need a ladder to get back up to the right note.

But they tap-dance up a storm. And besides, in a perverse way, the drummy singing, when done with gusto, is part of the fun.

Vo-doh-dee-oh-doh!

Arts Happenings

Arts Festival and more

This weekend offers a wide variety of entertainment for the Queen's and Kingston public, everything from folk music, through musical comedy, to experimental dance and a choral concert.

The Arts Festival '77 coffee house in the House of Commons finished up a successful week tonight with Henri Audet and Jim Duchesneau.

Musical comedy is represented by two very different shows. Your Own Thing at the Drama Department is a rock musical from the 60's playing tonight and tomorrow night at 8:30 p.m. in Convocation Hall, and at the Grant Theatre, Dames at Sea, a musical pastiche of the 1930's is playing at the same times.

In the Dance Studio in the Phys-Ed Centre, the Rimmon Experimental Dance Company will present a very unusual display of avant-gard music and movement. This will be tonight and tomorrow night at 8:30 p.m.

Classical music is well represented by the Vaghy String Quartet who will play a special concert in the Ban Righ fireside room Sunday at 6:30 p.m., and also by the Queen's Choral Ensemble who will be performing in Grant Hall at 8:30 p.m. this Saturday, (see article above).

Of note to film buffs and students of the cinema is the upcoming Canadian Federation of Film Societies' Annual General Meeting and Pre-view Weekend to be held on the Victoria Day Weekend (May 20-23) at the University of British Columbia in Vancouver. More information can be obtained by writing to: Cinema 16, Box 35, Student Union Building, U.B.C., Vancouver, B.C., V6T 1W5.

A sportscaster's dilemma - or . . .

If I only had words to tell you

by Tom Shand

If I only had the words to tell you, If you only had the time to understand, Though I know it wouldn't change your feelings And I know you carry on the best you can.

If you only knew how hard it is to say When the simple lines have all been taken And the radio repeats them every day.

Billy Joel

The job of the sportscaster is in a class all by itself in the radio business. The sportscaster's problems and decisions, both conscious and unconscious, go far beyond remembering who number nineteen is, or how his name should be pronounced.

Although Billy Joel's ballad "If I Only Had the Words to Tell You" certainly was not intended to be a heart-rending description of the anxieties of a sports broadcaster, its lyrics seem singularly applicable to such a description; for it is because of sportscasters that many people decide whether to go thumbs up or down on a team or individual.

In collegiate circumstances, this at times puts a heavy load on the shoulders of the broadcaster who must decide if what he sees is really what is going on, and why. Then there comes that critical moment when either one masks over the problem and protects; or lets it all out, and risks ruining a player's career or a team's reputation.

Although theoretically, honesty should be the best policy, there is usually far more to a game and its players than most people will ever hear.

Of course, when things are going well, the only problems are to find new superlatives and to try, at least a little bit, not to allow one's bias to eclipse one's objectivity.

Unfortunately there are many times when few bright lights are to be seen. Here at Queen's, high academic standards often serve to mask our perennial lack of athletic 'powerhouses' often, there is much more.

If it all becomes too much, the broadcaster can only hope people have stopped listening. After all, what purpose is served by letting the whole world know who is "dragging his ass".

Fortunately, sports broadcasting is a job where the rewards are rich and at times immeasurable. A great performance where everybody gives his 'all' is truly gratifying. The Gaels football victory over Ottawa this season is something I will always cherish just as CFRC's basketball crew will not soon forget the joy of the Gaels players in upsetting the York Yeomen last week.

At moments such as these it is always difficult to find "the words to tell you," but the toughest are those when the words are known but must be left unsaid.

Hopefully this weekend's matches with York and Toronto will prove to provide more of the former than the latter.

Livesay received the Lorne Pierce Medal for distinguished service to Canadian literature from the Royal Society of Canada in 1947.

While Ms. Livesay is known chiefly as a poet, she has also been a social worker, journalist, YWCA director, program supervisor of university correspondence courses, secondary school teacher, creative writing lecturer, UNESCO program specialist in France and Zambia, professor of English, wife, and mother of two children. She is currently writer-in-residence at the University of Ottawa.

Born in Winnipeg in 1909, Ms. Livesay moved to Toronto with her family at the age of 10. She studied at the University of Toronto, the Sorbonne in Paris and the University of British Columbia.

Her visit to Queen's is sponsored by the Department of English.

Mother of modern canadian poetry

Livesay at Watson

Dorothy Livesay, a poet remarkable for her strong pioneering personality, her social consciousness and her wide range of interests, will give a poetry reading at Queen's University on Wednesday, February 2 at 8 p.m. in John Watson Hall, room 517.

A firm believer in the human value of writing poetry, Ms. Livesay, a poet herself for more than five decades, persistently urges people to write verse.

She says her chief passion is to encourage young poets in self-knowledge and self-expression.

Recognized as one of Canada's most exciting and most prolific poets, Ms. Livesay is author of 12 volumes of original poetry, two books of prose, and editor of an anthology, Forty Women Poets.

She established herself as a major Canadian poet and gained international acclaim in 1967 with the publication of The Unquiet Bed, perhaps her most sensitive and sensuous verse.

More recently she has been active in reviving a poetry magazine called Contemporary Verse, which she helped found in Winnipeg in 1941.

Twice recipient of the Governor General's Award for Poetry, Ms.

Bitter Grounds "Sloth" was there

Bitter Grounds was host to The Original Sloth Band this past weekend, and the group, well-noted for its particular brand of expert musicianship fulfilled a well-received engagement.

In Tuesday's Journal we said that Michael Hasek was playing on Friday and Saturday. That should only have read this Friday, January 28. Hasek plays a very unconventional kind of blues and has been doing so for a number of years, touring Canada and the United States. It promises to be an evening of experienced performing that touches on the unexpected.

Mordecai Richler

by Sarah Edinborough

He says he's overweight and he drinks too much and he writes books. But Canadian author Mordecai Richler also managed to pack Dunning Hall on Tuesday night and keep a Queen's audience laughing for an hour. It's not that he's a showman, he told the audience that his speaking tours and foray into radio and television are at the request of his publishers.

Although he wasn't the crusty man I had expected to meet, a very shy Richler answered questions with as few words as possible.

Why did you leave Canada in the early 1950's?

At the time I went to Europe I was a very romantic kid. I thought I'd go to Paris, sit in cafes and write. You see in 1951 Canada was a very boring place - stultifying. I was sufficiently arrogant enough to want to make my reputation elsewhere. But a few years ago I felt I had to come back to my roots, because ultimately you're stuck with what you know best. We're all provincial that way.

Are Canadian nationalism and Canadian cultural identity important to you in your writing?

I think we're very neurotic about "Canadian identity". There are many different Canadian identities, we seem to be almost paranoid about it. Leave it alone, there is a culture. Ever since I was 18 or 19 and I first read Morley Callaghan's work in the New Yorker I thought "if you're good enough, you can be a Canadian writer writing about Canadian experience."

But do you think Canadians have a large enough audience to do that?

If you are writing fiction in English there's the whole English-speaking world out there. If you are a Canadian, American, English, or Australian writer you are in a very fortunate position I've always been critical of those writers who are better Canadians than they are writers. Ultimately protecting Canadian writers is bad for all. The country is yearning for good writing; money is available, but there's too much noise and too much attention being paid. It seems Canadian writers always feel they should have something to bitch about.

Is your work more regional in its concerns than national? For instance, do you think it has a lot in common with Jewish American writers like Saul Bellow?

Well, if you come from a big eastern city like Montreal and are brought up in the Jewish community there's bound to be a certain affinity with others in the same situation. We don't look out of the same window, but there is some shared experience. And I must say I admire Saul Bellow very much.

Who are your favourite writers, in the sense that they have influenced your writing or your thoughts about literature?

Evelyn Waugh has always been a favourite of mine, and in poetry I'm an Auden man. When I first started writing of course I was a very derivative writer, people like Hemingway interested me, but I soon realized the only way to write well was to stay within your own experience.

When you first started writing novels did you have anything in particular you wanted to say?

I wanted to write about things that I wanted to say, yes, and I don't think that it's contingent upon a novelist to be a positive thinker, but what I like to be is an honest witness to my time.

Apart from writing novels, you have also done a lot of journalistic work. Do you enjoy it?

Yes, I take my journalism very seriously, I work very hard at it. It also takes me out into unfamiliar ambiances which percolate in my mind and help me in my novel-writing. For instance, in the last six months I've been to a witches convention, interviewed hockey players and boxers - which are all quite useful.

Do you find screen-writing as enjoyable as journalism?

I don't particularly fancy screen-writing. What's to be said for it is that it's very well-paid. If you're writing a novel you're in total control, but in a film there are too many accidents.

Well then how did you feel about writing the screen plays for your own novels, THE APPRENTICESHIP OF DUDDY CRAVITZ and, more recently, ST. URBAIN'S HORSEMEN?

I was quite frightened about re-reading Duddy Cravitz, but I did and wrote the screen-play in six weeks. Nevertheless I think film is a simplification of a novel, not lacking in integrity or intent, but simplified nevertheless. Duddy Cravitz happens to be full of action and dialogue which is easily rendered into film. St. Urbain's Horsemen was more difficult.

You said you were frightened about re-reading Duddy. Why?

Re-reading anything I've written always embarrasses me after a few years. In fact, I've withdrawn my first published novel - it's now only available to very close family and friends. Have you consciously developed your writing style since the early 50's?

When you first start writing it's sufficiently exciting to see some fool publish your work. But as you get older, the publishing isn't enough, you demand more of yourself and you become more critical of your work.

Which of your books is your own favourite?

St. Urbain's Horsemen.

Why? Just because it's so recent?

No. I think it will always be a favourite of mine.

Are you working on something now?

Yes. A novel. But I'd really rather not talk about it. I'm terribly superstitious about that sort of thing. Wait until it comes out.

Queen's gymnasts 3rd in first home meet

by B. Smallwood

Saturday, January 22, was the occasion of the Queen's Men's Gymnastics Teams first home meet. The second opportunity that Queen's students will have to see gymnastics at the college level will occur this Saturday, January 29 at 1:00 p.m. in Bartlett Gymnasium. This upcoming competition will have an unusual attraction worth coming to see. Girls! Girls! Girls! This meet will be co-ed. Saturday's competition will feature the Queen's Women's Team, the Queen's Men's Team and an alumni team.

McCarthy

The Queen's Men's Team made a very respectable showing in last Saturday's competition, capturing third position behind York and Toronto. Competitors for Queen's were as follows: Martin Blaser, Gary Saunders, Bernie Blaser, Billy Greenbaum, Dave Roberts and Jamie Hutchinson. Under the watchful eye of Coach Jamie Archibald, the team made significant improvement over the first competitive showing they made. Still greater improvement is anticipated before the team meets at York University for the Eastern College finals.

Queen's riders stampede to sixth place finish in show

by Liane Benoit

This past weekend saw Queen's Equestrian Team trot off to Humber College to compete in the second annual C.U.R.A. Horse Show. The team was chosen from about thirty members of the Queens Riding Club who receive lessons once a week at Valhalla Riding Academy in Gananoque. Michelle Kromplak, Sally Irving, and Margo Coulter demonstrated their riding ability in dressage, shoe jumping, and a team relay. The three attendants, Margo Hutton, Carole Coward, and Liane Benoit, looked after the horses and rode in the attendant's class.

The team was up against stiff competition from ten teams representing Western, Guelph, and Toronto universities, and Humber and Seneca colleges.

Although the only first place Queen's managed to capture was in the lineup for the buffet at the banquet Saturday night—the team placed extremely well. Despite virtually no practise riding together as a team, our riders captured fifth place in the team dressage event. Margo Coulter and Michelle Kromplak both qualified to compete again individually in the semi-finals having placed third and ninth respectively after the team performance. The excitement rose as Michelle placed in the top four and proceeded to the quarter-final competition. Capturing first place in that show, Michelle qualified to compete against a rider from Western University in the dressage finals. After an excellent performance, she finished in second place just a few points behind the Western rider.

Dressage, for those not familiar with equestrian sports, is a competition that requires its participants to show their horses at different paces and figures following a set routine. The exercise requires a great deal of skill, athletic ability, and style since competitors are judged for their precision, riding ability, control, and overall competence in horsemanship. Michelle's performances proved that her success was well deserved and the receipt of all the awards was accompanied by the appropriate oil thighs to remind the audience of Queen's pride in their team.

The stadium jumping saw the Queens riders capture their highest team placing with a third place finish. Michelle Kromplak and Sally Irving took fourth and seventh place individually and both went on to participate in the semi-final jumpoff. After the final fences had been taken the results saw Michelle again in the spotlight with a sixth place overall standing. The last event of the day, the team relay, was a timed race over a difficult course without the benefit of any stirrups which left Queens with a sixth place standing in the show.

The team would like to extend a special thanks to Margo and Mr. and Mrs. Hutton for the kind hospitality they received over the weekend. The Huttons, I'm sure, will long be reminded of our visit by the peculiar scent of horse that now pervades their home.

The events of this weekend show that Queens does indeed have a great deal of equestrian talent among its students and the results show a definite promise for events to come. The Riding Club is always ready to welcome new members so if last weekend's events have caught your interest feel free to find out more by calling Heather Colbert at 564-2154 or Margo Hutton at 549-6181.

Swimmers put under

The Men's Swim Team returned to McGill last Saturday anxious to repeat the success of their previous trip to Montreal. Queen's men swimmers won the McGill Invitational in December competing against universities from both United States and Canada. Unfortunately despite strong swimming from all members of the team, McGill won handily with Plattsburg University just slipping ahead of Queen's on the very last race.

However there were some bright spots for Queen's as two new school records were set and the Boat Race and Bun Fight team led by team rowdies Ken Davies and Roger "Dodger" Cassidy emerged victorious while visiting "Brasserie Henri Richard" for some apres-nager activities. The new records were set by Greg Vanular in the 200 yd backstroke and by team captain Tim Dennis in the 200 yd I.M. These two combined with Drew "Druper" Fagan and Ken Davies to place an extremely close second to McGill in the Medley Relay with an excellent time. Fagan also swam two other strong races while Davies came second in the 100 freestyle. Scott Scheurmann and Brian "Bit Froggy" Dalziel both swimming the gruelling combination of the 500 and 1000 yds freestyle events also fared well.

Some other notable performances came from Joe Schnitter who swam an excellent race to finish third in the 200 Breaststroke, Marty "Maintain" Demmers who survived the 200 Butterfly, "Big" Andy Laing, Rodger "Dodger" Cassidy and "Largely" Britchford who all showed some speed in the sprints and Alex Muir, Gerry Bally and Jim Wiley who all swam well.

At the other end of the pool, divers while visiting "Brasserie Henri Richard" for some apres-nager activities. The new records were set by Greg Vanular in the 200 yd backstroke and by team captain Tim Dennis in the 200 yd I.M. These two combined with Drew "Druper" Fagan and Ken Davies to place an extremely close second to McGill in the Medley

The swim team headed by coaches Pike and Freedman travel to Toronto (with the Synchro Team - ALL RIGHT!) for two meets this weekend.

Redmen express dismay as Garbaly and Gaels win 73-48.

Gaels Sparkles at RMC

by Rob Bruce

Wednesday night the Queen's Golden Gaels basketball team travelled across town to defeat the R.M.C. Redmen by a 73-48 score. A physically tough game throughout, the stubborn R.M.C. team managed to keep within a couple of baskets of the Gaels until halftime when a 32-24 score was opened up. The quick tempo of the game took its toll on the R.M.C. squad, however, and outstanding efforts by Henry Garbaly and Rob Smart allowed the Gaels to pull away late in the third quarter.

Five Gaels reached double figures with Garbaly leading the way with 19 pts., Carleton and Boniwell followed with 11, while McCready and Smart had 10 apiece.

The Mackley twins provided over half of R.M.C.'s scoring as Rob Mackley had 15 while Jean netted 10.

Coach Smith said after the game that he was quite worried about the game that night because when you play a team like R.M.C. you have to throw out your record and play it as it comes.

The Gaels seek to make it three wins in a row when they meet the Blues in a key clash in Toronto on Friday.

Gaels into the game with a 3 win 5 loss record. When asked if he was pleased with this record, Coach Smith quickly replied, "Well, it's 3 wins better than last year, isn't it?"

Meds sews up first convincingly

by Mike Guinlock

As the hockey season moves into its final two weeks there are very few play-off positions left open. In Division 1, Arts 77, Arts 78 and Commerce 78 continue to battle for the top three spots. 77 appears to have the edge on first place. They are winning big but have been playing indifferently since Christmas. Both Arts 78 and Commerce 78 continue to play a bruising brand of hockey, tight checking, hard hitting yet with explosive offences. The fourth spot in the playoffs is still in doubt. The winner of the MBA-Mechanical game will probably fill that position.

In Division 2, Meds sewed up first place Tuesday night with a convincing 3-0 win over Commerce 79, however their championship hopes were dealt a severe blow when Gord

Porter, probably the best all-round player in the league, had to be carried from the ice on a stretcher with what appeared to be a broken ankle. The 79-Meds game was a fast and chippy encounter. Porter, Roscoe and Boyd all scored before the halfway point in the game, but Meds could not stretch their lead as they were forced to kill penalties the rest of the game.

PHE seems assured of a play-off position and Mining won a big game over Civil on Monday night to help their post-season aspirations. Top Five: No. 1 Meds, No. 2 Arts 77, No. 3 Arts 78, No. 4 Commerce 78, No. 5 (tied) PHE, Commerce 79.

SPORTS SHORTS Broomball play-offs start in the near future. The teams to watch are PHE, Commerce 77, Arts 77 and Education. Ball Hockey is underway and three-time defending champion Arts 77 looks like it will not repeat for an unprecedented fourth consecutive title. Civil appears to be too quick and strong. Basketball has also started and it appears the only race is to see who can finish second behind the powerful MBA squad.

WIC News

by Betti Stamps

With the third week of term already behind us WIC-sports are in full swing. Spirits are high and the competition keen out on the courts, the ice and in the pool this year.

ICE HOCKEY—Word has it that the PHE '78 hockey team is amazing and full of surprises out on the ice and anxious to meet any opponent. A warning to all other teams—don't miss this wonder on ice! Be sure to check the WIC bulletin board as the hockey schedule has been changed. The games have been lengthened from 15 min. to 30.

VOLLEYBALL—Last Tuesday night volleyball got underway. The games were exciting and enjoyed by all. The following games will be played Feb. 1st. 6-6:45—MBA vs Arts 79 and Meds vs. Arts 77-78, 6:45-7:30—PHE 79 vs Arts 79 and PHE 77 vs. Arts 77-78, 7:30-8:15—Sci. vs Chown and PHE 78-80 vs. Rehab; 8:15-9:00—Indep. vs. Chown and Arts 80 vs. Rehab. Check the WIC bulletin board for the competitive volleyball games that will be played on Saturday.

INNERTUBE—For a guaranteed good time come on out to the pool and support your unit or faculty in an innertube Waterpolo game. Games on February 2—10:10-30—PHE 77 vs. Meds; 10:30-11:00—MBA vs Arts, 11:11-30—Rehab vs. Law.

X-COUNTRY SKIING—Interested in participating in a genuine race? WIC and opportunity awaits you.

Needless to say—you don't have to be a good skier! The Race is to be held Wednesday, February 2, 9 pm at West Campus. There is an entry deadline—Monday, January 31. All details are posted on the WIC bulletin board, so be sure to check it.

Note: Skiing on Monday, January 31 is cancelled. For any girl who has already skied with WIC this year, check the bulletin board re: plans for a ski tour on Monday, February 7.

WINTER WORLD—Take an afternoon off from your studies and head on out to the Cedar Ridge Recreation Site. Enjoy some X-country skiing, tobogganing, or snowshoeing, hot chocolate and fireside. Hurry on over to the PHE centre and sign up on the WIC board this afternoon (your last chance) or call 549-2976. WIC will supply a bus that will be leaving the PHE centre at 1 pm and returning at 4:30. A fee of $1.50 is required. That's this Sunday, January 30—DON'T MISS IT!

End English courses

The Quebec provincial government has ordered an end to a federally-financed English language program presently offered to immigrants to Quebec. Immigration Minister Jacques Coutu announced the Parti Quebecois decision last Sunday, saying that the courses will be terminated at the end of March.

This decision by the Quebec government is part of its policy to make French the language of work in Quebec.

Federal Manpower and Immigration Minister J.S.G. Cullen wants to discuss the PQ action with Mr. Coutu. He is worried that francophones will be prevented "from participating in the English milieu."

The language courses were offered to immigrants who could already speak French and who needed English for their work. Approximately 180 people had intended to take the course beginning this spring.

Proposal rejected

On Monday, Rhodesian Prime Minister Ian Smith rejected British proposals for a transition government that would lead to black rule in 14 months. He felt that the proposals allowed for control of Rhodesia by a "marxist indoctrinated minority."

One black nationalist group said that Mr. Smith was "opting for war." However, a conservative black group, The Zimbabwe United People's Organization, agreed with the rejection of the proposals.

Mr. Smith now plans to seek an internal settlement between the black majority and his government instead of returning to the deadlocked Geneva conference set up by Henry Kissinger. He intends to use the framework of the transition plan proposed by Kissinger last September, but which was rejected in Geneva.

CBS and CIA

A CBS news report revealed that sources in Washington claim that Mr.

Bill Moirs, the CBS Washington reporter, is being considered as chief of the CIA. Mr. Moirs said he has not been approached about the job, nor has he actively sought the position.

French crisis

The shaky French Government was plunged into a serious crisis following a lightning decision by former Gaullist premier Jacques Chirac to run for mayor of Paris in elections this March. The elections are the first in history for this post which was replaced by that of a symbolic President of the Municipal Council more than a century ago.

Mr. Chirac will be running against the candidate picked personally by President Valéry Giscard d'Estaing, Premier Raymond Barre warned that the move risked dividing the ruling majority still further, boosting the chances of the Socialist-Communist opposition capturing the powerful post.

Subversives list

Three members of Parliament say a 1971 letter signed by the Solicitor-General list about 25 public servants and University professors who were considered subversives. They threatened to release a copy to the public if the present Solicitor-General, Francis Fox, did not provide them with a satisfactory explanation of why the list was drawn up.

Frank Oberle (PC, Prince George-Peace River) said Walter Rudnick, who was fired from his position as executive director of policy planning for Central Mortgage and Housing Corp., was on the blacklist. He was supposedly fired for showing native leaders a confidential report on native housing. The Supreme Court of Ontario later ruled that he was wrongfully dismissed and awarded him $18,000.

Mr. Rudnicki is convinced that the blacklist played an important part in his firing and is surprised he did not realize it earlier.

Mr. Oberle said he had no evidence that anyone except Mr. Rudnicki has been affected by the blacklist. Prime Minister Trudeau, Transport Minister Otto Lang, and Privy Council President Allen MacEachern denied all knowledge of the list.

Scientific fraud

The pressure for scientists to produce the most impressive findings in the shortest time, in order to get grants, has caused suspicion among scientists that the number of dishonest scientists is growing. An example of the type of falsifying is a scientist who painted dark patches on white mice to make his colleagues believe he had perfected a way to make skin grafts between non-twins.

Scientists express concern that such fraudulent data could result in approving a new drug or industrial chemical or waste the time and money of serious researchers attempting to repeat fraudulent or shoddy experiments.

Visit to US

Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau and his wife Margaret will pay an official visit to Washington D.C. on February 21 and 22 to see President Jimmy Carter. The Prime Minister will be the second foreign leader to meet with Mr. Carter. President Jose Portillo of Mexico will have been in the American capital a week beforehand.

the negotiations over contracts held between the city and its outside workers.

The public works employees have not been doing any overtime work on weekends for over two weeks, since negotiations over a new contract failed.

The charge by union members that an alderman had been eavesdropping on a meeting of union members has been proven false (he merely walked into the meeting unintentionally), but aldermen have been sitting in on contract bargaining sessions, which has only served to put unnecessary pressure on the proper city negotiating committee.

Police protest

Last Thursday a police commission meeting brought up the issue of young offenders. The Kingston police department is unhappy about the present system under which members of the police department's youth bureau are obliged to prosecute young offenders in the juvenile courts.

Many policemen would like to have an assistant prosecutor handling the court cases, since the policemen dislike having to prosecute young people in court after trying to talk to and help the offenders and their parents. The two jobs appear incompatible.

The crown attorney, Mr. Sampson, is under the opinion that this business has already been dealt with. Judge Campbell, police commission chairman, feels that Mr. Sampson is not being helpful enough, and he would like to see an assistant Crown attorney handling the juvenile cases. Meanwhile the two-man youth bureau police team remains sorely over-worked.

New computer firm

Five Kingstonians have formed a new business, Andyne Computing Ltd., which will sell, service and program computers. It is formed of ex-students and ex-employees of Queen's, all of whom are highly qualified.

The company has particular interest in developing small computer systems, ones fitting on a desk or occupying as much space as a filing cabinet. For such computers there appears to be a real market here in Kingston, especially since it is now possible to buy a complete computing system for less than $1,000. The company hopes to establish a regular office in or near Kingston shortly.

Trustees will decide co-op ownership-V.P.

by Rob Reynolds

The decision on whether Queen's University will assume financial control of Elrond College will rest with the Board of Trustees. Although Queen's Vice-Principal of Finance, David Bonham, stated before a meeting of the Senate, Thursday that, "the University is not anxious to step in", he did note that the Board of Trustees was ultimately responsible for any decision made by Queen's as to Elrond future.

The Whig Standard reported January 29th, in an article entitled "We Won't Touch Elrond," that "Queen's University has no intention of assuming ownership of Elrond College." The article was based upon Bonham's update of the Elrond situation presented to Senate.

Bonham later remarked to the Journal, "It's not for me to decide but for the Board of Trustees."

The Elrond issue was discussed Thursday at Senate in response to the report handed down January 24 by the Elrond Review Committee. The Committee recommended that the college appeal to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation (CMHC) to revise the mortgage payments. Failing that, the committee recommended, "that Queen's University assume title to the building."

Although the matter will be brought up with the Finance Committee of the Board of Trustees later this week, and with the Board on the week-end, any decision on whether the University should assume title of the college cannot be made until CMHC reaches their decision. Bill Young, chairman of the Elrond Review Committee stated, "The Board of Trustees will have to wait."

Young noted that the local CMHC representative had been contacted and that discussions would ensue.

Apathy & acclamations expected as all faculties close nominations

by Gerry Lewarne

Acclamations are becoming more and more prevalent for elected positions in the various societies. Commerce Society nominations closed as of Friday and there are four acclamations and five races for the nine positions. None of the other Societies have closed their nominations.

In ASUS, only one team, has submitted their names for the president-vice-president slate. They are Cathy Spoel (president) and Tom Box (vice-president). Only six people had submitted their names by press-time for 14 positions but Bob White ASUS president says that there are others who are interested "I would like to see a race for every position," said White. Nominations for ASUS close at 5:00 Wednesday. A nominee needs 25 signatures to enter a race. The Engineering Society appears also to be suffering from acclamations. Nominations close today at 5:00 and so far Steve Chapman is the only one who has submitted his nomination papers. Steve Greey was the only candidate for Vice-President at press time. All of the other positions are up for grabs and nominees need 50 names to be a candidate. An all-candidates meeting for Engineering will be held in Stirling Cat 7:30 Wednesday night.

The Aesculapian Society nominations close on Feb. 5 and two Classes were cancelled shortly after noon yesterday as the City of Kingston was hit by a snowstorm which dropped six centimeters of snow in under 10 minutes. The weather office said the storm should have eased off by last night.

Referendum requests overturn of decision on foreign student fees

Anne Johnson

Over five-hundred student signatures were secured on a petition requesting that the question of differential tuition fees for foreign [visa] students be placed on the February referendum. Because the required number of signatures were obtained, students will again be asked to vote on this issue. On the last referendum held in November, those students who did vote [less than 20 percent of all students] indicated their support of differential fees, 1544 to 852.

Bill Burgess, AMS Outer council member, said that although many of the students he canvassed felt that it was a "dead issue," a large number stressed that more information should have been circulated as to the various aspects of this complicated issue.

In certain ways, the vote was construed as an uninformed one. Burgess said that an ad hoc Students Against Differentials (SAD) committee has been formed to disperse information to Queen's students on the issue. He stated that "it is perfectly legitimate to test the students' for a second time," and that there was nothing wrong with trying to reverse the official stand now taken by the university.

According to Mr. J. M. Courtwright, Vice-Principal of Information and Development the outcome of this new referendum on differential fees "is really not going to change a thing." He explained that the government has taken a certain position because of pressures on various sides - the tax payers on the one hand, and the universities on the other. He emphasized that something which must be looked at is the exact number of people affected by differential fees. "The list of exemptions is formidable," he noted.

Hugh Christie, newly acclaimed AMS President responded by pointing out that it, in fact, the list of exemptions is large, "it seems to defeat the government's rationale behind the differential fee scheme - that of trimming the budget."

Christie said that although the last referendum's results were binding, he didn't feel that they were "really representative" of the views of most Queen's students. He was totally in favour of the question being put a second time, and noted that "if the students were more informed as to the intricacies of the issue, they would vote against differential fees." He had no definite plans as to what he would do to promote this educational campaign.

Bob White, President of ASUS, noted the added administrative headaches created for the universities by the government's decision to implement the differential fee program. Students might have to prove their Canadian citizenship in order to remain exempt from the 250 percent increase for foreign visa students.

Playoff hopes

Senate Committee on Academic Development:

"Steady state" for enrollment predicted

by Paul Finkel
Queen's as a "Steady State", Faculty situations, and the "quasi-full time student", were all part of a Senate Committee on Academic Development report submitted to the Senate last Thursday.

Presented in the form of a draft, the report said that "the University has nearly reached the constant size 'which is to be maintained for the rest of the decade.' Citing this condition as the 'Steady State', the report specified that a constant level of enrolment 'was neither an exact specification nor a formula for resisting change, but rather a basis for development without growth.'

References were made to students who after one or two years of a full curriculum decide to spread their workload over a "somewhat longer period than the three or four sessions between September and May", classifying them as "quasi-full time." The Committee noted that "in terms of academic criteria", such action was valid but added that "surges in the quasi-full time status", could lead to "perturbations in enrolment" which would require closer monitoring and perhaps even moderation.

The report also contained comments for each Faculty which concentrated on "unusual circumstances" or "modifications of plans."

Mr. A.J. Marshall (Classics) who elaborated on the Committee's observations for Senate, said that "special attention" had been paid to some areas within the university. He stated that the Committee "could not foresee" the impact which increases in fees to foreign students could have on enrolment in Graduate Studies Programs. Mr. Marshall further explained that it would be "premature to attempt any policy changes" in anticipation of results from talks between the Deans of Education and the Ministers of Education and of Colleges, regarding enrolment and funding for the Faculty of Education.

The report drew harsh criticism from the Student Centre Caucus in the form of a statement read to Senate by Ms. M. Churcher (Meds 79). The Caucus could "not help but deplore (the) steady but slow increase" proposed in the report. Stating that facilities such as the Library and the Phys-ed Centre were already being strained beyond effectiveness and that there "already existed a mad rush each spring for sub-standard housing", it called for the University to avoid pushing for quantity in graduates and to let students develop to their full potential. The statement concluded by imploring SCAD to "consider the impact" of increases in enrolment "on the quality of education at Queen's."

Further questioning was lead by Mr. D. Gordon (1st year Graduate Studies) who queried the availability of resources to accommodate the near 170 student increase slated for the Faculty of Applied Science from 1976-80 culminating at a total enrolment of about 1600.

Principal Watts replied that the increases were merely "filling up" the Faculty to "a capacity that already existed", due to enrolments over the past four or five years which had fallen short of present targets.

Dr. D.B. Jennings (physiology) questioned the reports claim that "pressure on programs in Biology and Life Sciences had eased and that enrolment had leveled off." He felt that although SCAD was acting to regulate student numbers, "pressure" on the physical resources within the Life Science Departments still existed.

Other topics covered in the report included the possible creation of new programs such as a Ph.D. in Business and M.A. in Art History and in Music.

The Senate will be asked to adopt the "plans and projections" of the SCAD report in February and "request the Faculty Boards to administer their admissions accordingly."

The increased University funding is consistent with the increase in their operating grants for next year. Their portion is, therefore, $3.82 per student, an increase of 27c a student. Queen's students will be asked to approve an increase of 50c over last year, which will raise their contribution from $5.35 to $5.85, which according to Steep is still under the "acceptable limit of six dollars."

Bus-it to increase 50c per student next year

by Ross Bartlett

The University and AMS Vice-President (Operations) Paul Steep have worked out a system of funding for the Bus-it program for next year. This new arrangement will cost Queen's students an extra fifty cents; permission for the increased levy will be sought on the February referendum.

Last year, the University gave notice that the existing percentage breakdown of Bus-it costs was no longer acceptable. Under the old system the University paid 40 percent of the cost of Bus-it while the students made up the remaining 60 percent. Because the cost of the program was seen to be rising so quickly the University insisted on changing the funding arrangement to one whereby it would pay a dollar figure per student, in dollar terms the University's contribution last year was $35,000 or $3.55 per student. Queen's students contributed $5.35 each.

Last week Steep and the Public Utilities Commission reached an agreement on a total cost for Bus-it at $98,000 for 1977-78. There had originally been fears that the University would not increase its share of the funding. This "initial negative reaction" says Steep was largely due to the high cost of the originally proposed price for the program - $114,000. This price was unacceptable both to the University and to the AMS and was subsequently lowered.

"In light of the concessions which we managed to win," the program acquired greater interest for the University. "The University has always been interested in funding a transportation program", Steep maintains. Recently this enthusiasm has been directed towards exploration of the possibility of a shuttle service between main and west campuses, a program which would have been introduced had an agreement on Bus-it not been forthcoming.

The increased University funding is consistent with the increase in their operating grants for next year. Their portion is, therefore, $3.82 per student, an increase of 27c a student. Queen's students will be asked to approve an increase of 50c over last year, which will raise their contribution from $5.35 to $5.85, which according to Steep is still under the "acceptable limit of six dollars."

Canada Campus Notes

Jewett on balanced enrollment

EDMONTON (CUP) - A nation-wide program encouraging students to attend out-of-province universities is needed to balance enrolment disparities expected to hit Canadian universities within 10 years, according to the president of Simon Fraser University.

Dr. Pauline Jewett said enrolment on western university campuses will rise 11 to 16 percent by 1978. But enrolment in Quebec and the Maritimes is expected to drop eight to 10 percent, she told the Men's and Women's Clubs Jan. 19.

A federal government sponsored program is necessary "to promote inter-provincial mobility of university students" so they can be channelled into institutions with vacancies she said.

Noting the biggest projected decline is in Quebec she argued that the exchange would foster national unity and bilingualism.

Jewett admitted the problems in initiating the scheme "boggle the mind". A major stumbling block would be persuading provincial governments to allow increased federal presence in education, she added, noting that increased federal subsidies could sway them.

Also, improved course transfer between universities would have to be developed she said.

Jewett called for a "tripartite group" involving federal and provincial governments with university governing boards to co-ordinate the program.

The idea was raised at the November meeting of the Association of Universities and Colleges and is on the agenda for the group's Board of Directors meeting in February.

At this point any steps to limit inter-provincial mobility of Canadian university students must be discouraged, she said.

"I'm totally opposed to provincial fee differentials," Jewett said. "While saying she is 'unhappy about any tuition fee' the SFU president said, 'I'm not as totally opposed to differential fees for foreign students.'

UBC Sacking termed a scandal

VANCOUVER (CUP) - The dismissed head of the University of British Columbia's Hispanic and Italian studies attacked the UBC administration Jan. 19 and called his dismissal a scandal.

Harold Livermore made his statements while defending himself in the controversy over his continuing to earn department head wages of $41,000 a year while he is writing a book and teaching three students.

In a letter to the Ubyessee, the student newspaper, Livermore said Board of Governors student member Basil Peters' "assurance that the dismissal was entirely above board" can only be based on distorted information. "He didn't get it from me," Livermore wrote.

The board dismissed Livermore as department head Sept. 7 following complaints that he was a poor administrator.

When asked in an interview Jan. 19 to expand on the charges made in his letter, Livermore said, "It's a scandal. There's no doubt about it."

U of M boycotts CBC ads

WINNIPEG (CUP) - The student newspaper at the University of Manitoba will reject paid advertising from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC) because of the network's refusal to air public service announcements for gay organizations.

The recent decision by Manitoba staff followed confirmation of the CBC's actions by Norm Cown of the CBC public relations office.

The network's written policy states it is "the considered CBC view that Canadian Society is not ready at the present time to condone homosexuality as socially acceptable. Because of that fact, it is controversial activity. Under the CBC policy, controversial (subjects are reported) in programs rather than in public service announcements."

Cown said the CBC's intention was to review the policy regarding gays at least once a year. He did not know when the next review would be made, but he said the issue is not dead.

"We like to think we are very open on these subjects and willing to look at them again," he said.

The CBC's policy first became an issue last fall in Nova Scotia when the Dalhousie Gazette learned the Gay Alliance for Equality was not able to have its public service announcements aired on CBC's Halifax radio station.

During the annual December Canadian University Press conference held in Vancouver, delegates from member newspapers across Canada held a resolution stating "that individual paper staffs be encouraged to examine this issue and boycott CBC radio advertising."

The decision taken by Manitoban staff, however, includes both radio or television advertising.

Law for the layman

by Trish Crowe

Five lectures are planned in a series sponsored by the AMS Education Commission under the title of "Law for the layman."

The first lecture, on February 2, will deal with rights and obligations of the tenant, under the landlord-Tenant Rent Review. The February 8 lecture will describe police powers of arrest, seizure and search

On Tuesday, February 15, the workings and prerequisites of Legal Aid will be discussed. Proposals for reform in family law is the title of the March 1 lecture and a lecture on Consumer Protection Insurance is planned for March 8.

All lectures will be given in Stirling 'D' and will commence at 2:30 pm.

Convocation change

Geoff Gomery

The 1978 Fall Convocation dates in all faculties have been postponed one week by the Senate Committee on Academic Procedures. For the first time in many years, the last fall convocation, that of the faculty of Arts and Science, will be held in June, on June 4.

The change was made at the request of the faculties of Arts and Science and Applied Science. Dean Sinclair, of Arts and Science, explained that the change was needed to supply the time necessary for grading and the preparation of a degree list between the end of exams and the convocation. The academic dates shift within their respective months in cycles, which this year didn't leave enough time for the administrative work necessary in the issuing of degrees.

The official calendar is usually prepared and published two or three years in advance. In this case, according to Dr. Sinclair, the Academic Procedures Committee had made a mistake, and hadn't checked the dates with the faculty, necessitating the change.

Legal Aid referendum students asked to decide

Students will be asked to decide February 9-10 in the referendum, whether the student activity fee allocated to the Queen's Law Students' Legal Aid Society, should be fixed permanently at 75c per student.

Last year, as a result of financial difficulties facing Legal Aid, students voted to increase the levy from 25c to 75c for the year 1976-77.

The funds provided last year by the Ontario Legal Aid Plan (approximately $24,000) represented an increase of only 5 percent over the previous year. The Society's present financial state remains uncertain until the Ontario Government announces its budget, which is expected in March.

Reg McLean, member of the executive of the Queen's Legal Aid Society, said that the services provided by the Society are worth at least 75c. "Queen's Legal Aid provides a valuable service to the students of the university. Any student at Queen's can approach members of the Society for free legal assistance."

Legal Aid has been instrumental in educating students in their rights under the recent Rent Review, and Tenant and Landlord legislation, explained McLean.

Legal Aid provides services to the community. It is in some senses, said McLean, "a contribution to the community on the part of students."

Queen's Legal Aid is staffed by law student volunteers. The Society runs three projects: for the Kingston community, Belleville and the Rural Legal Services.

CUP works on principles

by Debra Sigler

In attempting to define the importance of CUP as a news service, Dave Colburn, CUP field worker, and part of next year's CUP executive cited "defeat of campus isolation, coordination of coverage of certain events, and providing relief for tired news," as among its major goals.

Colburn also felt CUP could aid "in the spread of successful tactics, for example, Bus-it can be learned about by other universities and used as a possible alternative there. He went on to point out, "A university news service can also educate the staff of a paper as to what news is, and how to write it." Colburn defined the role of a newspaper as "having a responsibility to provide information not available elsewhere. We should educate ourselves about the social order and report on alternatives to this order." Colburn then went on to define objectivity in news as "standing for fairness, accuracy and substantiation." You can't be objective unless you have all three.

When questioned as to the conflict raised over the CUP statement of purposes for the news service, Colburn asserted that they have been developed by those with Marxist-Leninist leanings and are a product of the 1960's still being involved in the "hippie-dippie touchie-feelie stuff."

At present a new statement of principles is being worked out by several universities, but as yet no consensus has been reached.

(AMS Referendum) (Feb. 9, 10)

The AMS has received notice that the following four questions are likely to appear on the February referendum. As of Jan 30, only question 1 (NUS) has been approved by Outer council.

Should the AMS become a member of the National Union of Students at a cost per student of $1.00 to be added to the student interest fee?

Yes _____ No _____

The National Union of Students [NUS] is a nationwide organization of students with over 30 members. Its two main functions are to assist in the formulation of student policy on federal issues and to provide a forum for the exchange of ideas among students from all provinces. The cost of joining is $1.00.

Should the AMS continue the BUS—IT agreement with Kingston PUC at a cost per student of $5.85 to be collected as part of the student interest fee?

Yes _____ No _____

BUS—IT is the agreement between the Alma Mater Society and the Kingston PUC which allows students to ride city buses without paying the 30c fare. The proposed contract price for the coming year is $98,500. Of this, the University will contribute $38,964, leaving $59,536 for students to pay. It is estimated that there will be 10,200 students at Queen's next year, so the cost per student will be $5.85. Last year the cost per student was $5.35, but since then the standard fare has increased from 25c to 30c and the number of students using the bus has increased.

Shall the allocation of the Student Interest Fee for Queen's Legal Aid remain at 75c per student?

Yes _____ No _____

Queen's Legal Aid, provides legal advice on a variety of matters to Queen's students and members of the Kingston community. Last year students approved a fee of 75c for Queen's Legal Aid, but that approval only extended for one year. This year students are being asked to approve the same 75c fee for an indefinite period until it needs to be changed on a future referendum.

I disagree with the Ontario Government's policy of applying differential (higher) tuition fees to (visa) foreign students?

Yes _____ No _____

The Ontario government has established a policy of charging higher tuition fees to students from other countries who are studying in Ontario with a student visa. Every such student who enters an Ontario university after Jan. 1, 1977 must pay tuition fees of $750 per term or $1500 per year [$2250] for graduate students. Fees for other students will be about $350 per term of $700 per year starting in September, 1977.

University year round

by Paul Henderson

There has been observed at Queen's the development of a phenomenon which has been termed the "quasi-full-time student." In a SCAD report presented to the Senate last Thursday evening, it was noticed that "students are choosing a more flexible pattern of study." Apparently, they are spreading their academic workloads over longer periods by taking advantage of the spring and summer terms and thereby lightening the demands of the winter term.

Mr. M. Creet, of the Office of Academic Planning, asserted that, at present, this development is merely an observation, and that little has been done to document the extent or effects of the trend. Consequently, Mr. Creet advised, one must be cautious in drawing hasty conclusions. However, he was willing to suggest a few hypotheses as to the reason behind the development. First, it may be related to the presently high rates of unemployment and the consequent inability of graduates to obtain jobs. There is, as a result, a greater incentive to stay at school. Secondly, Mr. Creet further pointed out that there may be a desire on the part of the student to merely lighten the academic load by taking advantage of the spring and summer semesters. This opportunity, Mr. Creet observed, would be especially attractive to students who participate in demanding extra curricular activities.

As reasonable as these hypotheses may seem, Mr. Creet concluded, they can only be considered speculation until further research can be carried out on the issue.

Queen's prof elected to clinical Council

by Debra Sigler

Dr. Tassos Anastasiades, has been elected to the Council of the Canadian Society for Clinical Investigation. "It's a national association that represents many specialties in the field of clinical research," explained Dr. Anastasiades.

The two major objectives of the council are "to provide a forum for scientific presentation, held in association with the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons, and to promote the funding of clinical research in Canada," said Dr. Anastasiades. "The Council forms committees which study the problems of funding, and act as a liaison with the Federal government, and the Medical Research Council."

Dr. Anastasiades is presently Director of the Rheumatic Disease unit here, as well as an associate professor in the Departments of Medicine and Biochemistry.

Where's Kingston going?

Can Kingston's image change?

by Maben Smith

Combustion engineering, a Canadian firm of professional engineers, has chosen to relocate its head office in Ottawa rather than in Kingston as was earlier speculated. Is Kingston successfully attracting industrial growth? The Journal interviewed Industrial Commissioner David Stevens in order to elicit his views concerning growth within the city of Kingston.

Mr. Stevens pointed out that there is a changing mood within the city regarding industrial or commercial development. He mentions that as little as forty years ago the major concerns of the city were of strictly military and educational natures. Although these continue to play a key role, they have nevertheless been joined by a number of non-institutional enterprises. Furthermore, according to Mr. Stevens, there is excellent compatibility between military, educational and industrial factors today.

Progress and growth

In order to ensure the continued growth of the city, the Industrial Commissioner claims there must exist a correct approach both within City Hall and by the citizens. Mr. Stevens emphatically states there is no such thing as 'status quo' in his mind—either the City is moving forward from its present position or it is in fact degenerating. He talks not of growth for growth's sake, but of a progressive movement that takes into consideration the many fine aspects of this city. We can mold any growth so as to fit the desires of Kingstonians.

Mr. Stevens says it is inevitable that the city is going to grow. Present trends recognized by the Provincial and Federal governments display a decentralization from the larger centres, Toronto and Montreal, in favour of the smaller. Kingston in particular has a number of big city amenities; it is serviced by two railroads, it is located near a major thoroughfare, and it has a municipal airport that has the potential of developing into a STOL-port. It also offers recreational facilities unlike those of the larger cities. Mr. Stevens feels that as a city, Kingston is well-endowed with everything we have to offer. This allows the city to be more selective in its choice of potential developments.

With regard to Combustion Engineering's decision, the Industrial Commissioner is quick to point out three major weaknesses that led to the firm choosing Ottawa over Kingston. The first is the fact that Norman Rodgers Airport is undergoing expansion, but at too late a date. Had it now been offering connecting flights to Toronto or Montreal on a regular basis, Mr. Stevens feels the engineering firm's choice might have been different. Secondly, there is only a small amount of office development within the city, which would have meant two moves for Combustion Engineering. The initial move would have had to be made into temporary space while the firm constructed its own building. Ottawa presently offers plenty of space for the firm's purpose. The final shortcoming deals with single family residences. There has been no substantial development of this sort for over ten years within the city's boundaries. Mr. Stevens feels that although the Planning Board is opposed to single family dwellings, it should allow for them thereby ensuring a varied amount of residential facilities. He fears that too many apartment buildings and too much row-housing will further increase the problem.

unwanted publicity

Mr. Stevens also pins some of the blame over the Combustion Engineering case on the local media. Until November of last year the possibility of the firm moving to Kingston had not been disclosed to the public, but in that month the Whig Standard, against Stevens' wishes disclosed the firm's name in print. At this point, the cities of Cornwall and Ottawa took it upon themselves to lure the firm away from Kingston. Mr. Stevens is disturbed about the Whig's move and feels that complete confidentiality is crucial within his office.

Mr. Stevens is hopeful that the correct approach to future development will soon become evident within the city; one that will more easily facilitate his job. He hopes that the negative attitude of many academics, councilmen, and even the Mayor at times, will dissolve. Mr. Stevens trusts that the Combustion Engineering case will turn out to be a well-heeded lesson.

The Queen's Journal, Tuesday, February 1, 1977

Queen's Journal

editorial opinion

Membership defended

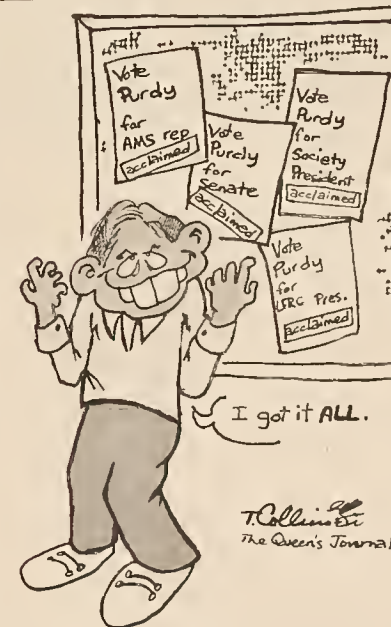

The Journal has come under considerable fire since our editorial on January 13 regarding our membership in the Canadian University Press (CUP). We said at that time we are members under protest of the 72 member syndicate because of the political stance taken in the statement of purposes for the news service and in the Statement of Principles of Canadian University Press. Our position has not changed on these principles but we feel a need to justify our membership.

With respect to the costs of belonging to CUP, we find the prospect of a 70 percent increase in fees exorbitant given our limited use of CUP material and services. Even assuming an expected 70 percent increase, though, the total cost of our membership fees would only amount to roughly 6 percent of the Journal's budget. There are college papers spending more than half of their operating budgets on CUP fees; papers which probably would not exist but for an organization to provide them with advertising and news copy.

There is a limit to our altruism, particularly in light of the existing principles of CUP. We are actively working for change and will have an opportunity to realize this change at a CUP conference in March.

The Canadian University Press was established to facilitate the flow of information between member campuses. It should provide services to members and assist in the protection of the freedom of the press. But its main concern should always be the defense of the principles of fair, accurate and substantiated reporting of campus news. We firmly believe that this should form the foundation of the organization. We intend to do all we can to see this objective realized. Impartial news reporting on the views and opinions of students in their role as 'critical observers of society' will point out any injustices or flaws which might exist in our society. This in no way means that CUP itself should prescribe change in accordance with any dogma, left or right.

We believe in the organization though we do not employ many CUP services offered. There is an unquestionable need for a Canadian University Press syndicate. The Journal founded the organization with these same opinions in mind. The Journal does not subscribe to the present principles of the organization but to withdraw our membership until, in Jamie Avis' words, CUP "comes to its senses" would not facilitate the changes we seek.

On Political Leadership

by Paul Dalle-Molle

"A society in which consumption has to be artificially stimulated in order to keep production going in a society founded on trash and waste, and such a society is a house built on sand."

If North Americans live in what Dorothy L. Sayers has called a "house built upon sand", then we should be looking to how to get the structure on a good foundation before it collapses. Futurologists, from the Club of Rome to Daniel Bell, tell us that our house is under great stress and that there are even periodic breaks at critical points. These are hastily repaired-patched up and smoothed over—but the foundation remains bad. Some of our leaders are busy playing games on the third floor of our house, while others are out in the backyard struggling to pour concrete into the foundation. Who, in Canada, is doing what?

All three of the recent Dunning Trust lecturers are in some sense, political leaders. The topic to which they were supposed to address themselves was "Energy Resources and the Quality of Life". No other issue has the same long-term importance to Canadians as does that of an energy policy. The energy issue is a microcosm of energy dilemma which this nation faces as it decides how to live sanely in the world of the coming generation. Transportation, personal consumption, GNP growth, primary resource extraction, recreational habits, urban growth: these are only some of the issues which one directly related to the way a nation uses energy. As an example, the newspapers have recently run stories comparing Canada's energy extravagance with that of the equally prosperous but drastically more frugal Swedes.

An elitist response?

The first Dunning Trust lecturer, William Erwin Thompson, is acutely aware of the shaky nature of our social structure. The outcome of his personal and intellectual struggle with this has led him to political leadership by example. Thompson Lindesfarne or John Todd's PEI community New Ark—is the way our society MUST move. His response has been criticized as elitist or utopian. But it is bold and honest, and certainly serious. He has addressed the future.

Kimon Valaskakis, the third lecturer, has directed the Gamma group report, "the Conserver Society". Equally aware of the problems as Thompson, Valaskakis and Gamma have outlined various stages for Canada's future. They believe that Canada MUST become a Conserver Society, "to do more with less", and thereby provide a better quality life in Canada. His report has been criticized for being ponderous and somewhat useless for specific policy action. But the report is having tremendous influence in the Government and in business.

Clark 'plays games'

Both Thompson and Valaskakis are among those "out in the back yard struggling to pour concrete into the foundation" of our society. The second Dunning lecturer, the Hon. Joe Clark, is not. He is upstairs playing games, adding to the stress of this nation. Clark, in his lecture and in his daily activity, seems oblivious to the problems dealt with by Thompson and Valaskakis. On the energy issue, which he did not even discuss, he seems quite inadequate. When compared to a responsible leader such as Premier Edward Schreyer of Manitoba, Clark is a fine example of a politician who, as Irwin Thompson characterized, discovers an important issue only after it has been absorbed by a huge section of the population.

Nine days ago prof. George Perlin, from Queen's Dept. of Political Studies, was the guest on CBC radio's "Cross-Country Check-up". He characterizes most current political leadership as "reactive, not responsive". This may be another way of saying what everyone seems already to know: that politicians blow with the political wind because their jobs do not depend on being right or responsible, but merely on being popular. Joe Clark is the perfect example of such a man.

A case against differential fees

by Brian Lawson

Last May the Minister of Colleges and Universities announced that tuition fees for international students would be raised to $1,500 for undergraduate university students and $750 for community college students. This is, in effect, a tripling of the average fees for foreign students in Ontario. The province now has the dubious honour of being the only place in the world that charges such a huge differential fee. Some people may be under the impression that the United States and Great Britain charge differential fees to out-of-country students. This is not true. Great Britain has recently decided to stop charging a higher fee for international students. As for the U.S.: students from other countries do have to pay a higher fee than state residents, but this is because there is an out-of-state differential fee charged.

Why then does the government feel international students should pay more? They argue that it is due to mounting public concern about the cost to the Ontario taxpayer of educating international students. Yet when questioned they were unable to point to any specific expressions of such concern. Besides, less than 0.6 percent of the present total post-secondary education budget might be saved through charging international students more. This comes to a saving of less than $1.00 per Ontario taxpayer.

It is clear the government is attempting to successfully implement its restraint programme by singling out a sector of the university and college population. In this sense, differential fees certainly have racist overtones. This backward policy is part of the government's overall strategy to cutback on all social services at the expense of workers, pensioners, women, the medically sick and now foreign students. If unequal and racist fee hikes are successfully implemented the cutbacks offensive will score another success.

And this strategy will succeed if students fall into the government's dividend and triumph plan. It is an old ploy being utilized once again whereby different types of students are pitted against one another and the government can then apply its restraint programme. In the end, all students will suffer because it will be possible to make all of us, black-white, foreign-domestic, pay higher tuitions and residence fees. In turn, the university will become even more socially unrepresentative and closed to working class children.

There are also other reasons for questioning the validity of Ontario's regressive action. Forty-six percent of the international students in post-secondary institutions in Canada are from developing countries. Six thousand of these students are from countries categorized by the United Nations as the poorest and least developed countries in the world. Accessibility to colleges and universities is probably the least expensive and most rewarding form of foreign aid.

What then should we do to defeat differential fees? Firstly, it is important to realize that the government can be persuaded to withdraw the fee hike for international students. Tuition increases and other cutbacks have been successfully opposed in the past. This would be especially true if students at Queen's began to actively express their opposition.

For whatever reasons then, political, moral or personal, students should join together around defeating the differential fees. At Queen's this involves a reconsideration of the referendum which came out in favour of the fee hike! Hopefully, this time students will seriously consider the issue and its profound repercussions, and not only vote against any fee hike but also actively oppose this government policy.

Notes on university affairs

THE QUEEN'S JOURNAL has asked each member of the new AMS executive to outline their views on the issues they will deal with next year. This first article deals with the role of AMS Vice-President (University Affairs).

by Jodi Button

The role of Vice-President of University Affairs is relatively loosely-defined in comparison to others in the AMS. In general terms though, the position holds responsibility for questions or matters of a political or academic nature. With these concerns as the ultimate goal, the Vice-President of University Affairs has an ex-officio seat on the University Senate, the Senate Committee on Academic Affairs, the Principal's Housing Committee and the Advisory Review Committee on the Status of Women among others. In addition, special concern is given to housing and residences, and awareness and input into various external bodies including OFS, NUS and the Kingston community.

Senate, while characterized normally by a low profile and as being of little interest to the majority of students is actually becoming increasingly important. Universities are quite obviously being forced to grapple with the present period of government restraint. When the decisions concerning cutbacks are made it is imperative that the students' best interests are clearly represented and taken into serious consideration. All decisions of an academic nature are made at Senate. The channel of communication is made available to us and it is unquestionably in our best interests to take full advantage of it. Student strength in the Senate could be nothing but stronger if students would be persuaded to consider applying for positions on the Senate Committees with the eventual outcome of substantially increased awareness and participation in the system.

The role of the AMS researcher is one that needs to be brought into sharper focus. Presently, Kathy Grant's efforts are used almost solely by the executive and the commissions. The information at her disposal could be invaluable to student Senators, those in the Senate Committees and to each and every student at Queen's interested in background policies or issues, in need of advice or housing and so on. We are presently in the process of developing more clearly defined long-term plans for the researcher but this in no way limits the eagerness to be of help to anyone wishing to use the service.

One further area I will touch on, at this moment is that of housing. Recently, the AMS struck a Housing Committee which is awaiting the final returns of a survey which was developed with the intention of being able to better articulate the issues and problems in student housing. The survey coupled with the enthusiasm of the newly formed Principal's Student Housing Committee, our intention to review the AMS housing situation and our desire to get the Queen's Tenant's Association back on its feet combine to promise what we hope to see ultimately as a great number of improvements.

CUP 'not in our best interests'

Dear Editor:

Tuesday's Journal (January 25) contained an article by Rob Reynolds (CUP Conference as seen by a delegate) in which he attempted to clarify the role of CUP. The argument presented was a bunch of crap. I had expected a well reasoned, pertinent argument.

Mr. Reynolds claims that CUP exists "to insure that student governments do not try to impose editorial control upon campus newspapers." However, a recent Journal editorial says that CUP was founded "to distribute news of university affairs throughout the member newspapers." This would seem to be the more realistic and, hopefully, the true reason for CUP's existence.

For the moment, let us consider Mr. Reynolds' argument. Editorial control of the Journal by the AMS is not an impossibility, but it is highly unlikely. The AMS constitution insures that the Journal is independent from any student body and that editorial control remains with the editorial board. Mr. Reynolds used the Chevron as the most recent example of student government control over a campus newspaper, but he failed to mention that the student body President was also removed from office as a result of that action. There are two questions I would like to raise here. First, is it really necessary to have an outside agency such as CUP to ensure editorial freedom? I would think that students are capable of performing this function, as the incident at Waterloo illustrates. Secondly, where was CUP when the Chevron needed it and what did CUP do to help the Chevron start publishing again? Perhaps the most important fact to note is that CUP did not insure the Chevron's freedom of editorial control. Mr. Reynolds has agreed that AMS control over the Journal is highly unlikely, therefore I submit that CUP is useless in this function and is not needed here at Queen's.

CUP is not a political organization, nor is it an organization that should be dedicated to political reform. It is a news service and as such CUP's purpose is to gather and report news. This requires a high degree of impartiality, which CUP can not provide given its current statement of principles.

Thirty-nine years ago the Journal founded CUP for a purpose. Today that purpose is not being fulfilled and the Journal is not benefitting from its membership. Bernie Helling, a Journal news staff member, recently wrote, "the Queen's Journal should divest itself of all ties with CUP and devote its energy and resources to other, perhaps alternate and more responsible, means." I could not agree more. Until CUP represents the principles on which it was founded, our membership would not be in the best interests of the Journal or the students of Queen's.

From the cloister:

Rising enrollment is straining resources

by Margaret Churcher

In January of each year, the Senate Committee on Academic Development (Scad) presents to Senate, for its approval, the current projected levels of enrolment for Queen's. The Student Senators as a whole were deeply concerned about the fact that these figures are still increasing and hence the following speech was made at the January meeting of Senate last Thursday:

"On behalf of the Student Senator Caucus, I (Margaret Churcher, Chairperson, Student Senator Caucus) would like to make a statement concerning the importance of these annual projections for Senate and University as a whole. As students we deplore the trend of steady although slow increase in numbers of students at Queen's and feel that even at the present level of enrolment, resources are strained well beyond the point at which we can maximize benefits from our stay at university. We are fully aware of the problem admissions committees face in turning away many good students, but we feel it is more important for Queen's to fulfill its commitment to graduating thoughtful, well-informed students than to process through large numbers of mediocre students merely for the sake of adhering to a government policy of universal accessibility. As one member of SCAD so succinctly pointed out at a recent meeting of the Committee, 'Our goal is not to pack the joint.' Instead it must be to offer each and every student who comes to Queen's the opportunity to develop critical powers of thought and to use that critical thinking to either pursue new knowledge and/or to criticize and provide leadership in society. Lectures with 200 students, over used laboratory and library facilities, overcrowded phys. ed. areas and the mad scramble each spring for substandard housing: none of these are conducive to meeting such a goal.

We, as students, are deeply concerned that the university education we are receiving is gradually declining in quality and that to a large extent this may be attributed to too large a student body. We therefore urge all of you, as members of Senate, to not merely gloss over these projections but to thoroughly assess and consider their impact on the quality of education here at Queen's. Surely this is the time when we should be considering if we really are providing the best human and academic environment for furthering post-secondary education which we so vehemently profess to be a major goal of the university.

"Really enjoyed play"

Dear Editor:

Not everyone who saw the play "Your Own Thing" was as disappointed as some people have indicated. I should probably inform you that I have never taken a drama course, nor do I know a great deal about a critical review. However, I do know one thing, and that is, I thoroughly enjoyed "Your Own Thing." It is for this reason, that I am writing you this letter, as I want everyone who was involved in the production of "Your Own Thing", to know that there were many people in the audience who felt it was a very good performance. Talent was undoubtedly revealed by all of the actors and the orchestra. It was quite obvious too, that a lot of hard work, time and effort went into the production, which I feel deserves some appraisal. I just want you to know that there are a lot of people who had a great evening at Convocation Hall last week, and who really appreciated, "Your Own Thing".

NUS Evaluated: it's worth buck a head

AMS President Jamie Avis

by Jamie Avis

The need for a body to make representations on behalf of all Canadian students to the federal government, and the advantages of having a forum in which to meet and exchange views with our extra-provincial counterparts are two excellent reasons for belonging to a national student federation. But why choose the National Union of Students? Is it an adequate vehicle for the realization of these ends?

Since we began considering holding a referendum on joining NUS, I have made some efforts to evaluate the organization. I have spoken to staff representatives and they have impressed me as being dedicated, informed and pragmatic individuals, who are capable of performing the job expected of them. Since a student federation is a service organization, it is labour intensive. The major investment is in people. Therefore a good staff is a prerequisite for a viable organization. I think NUS has a strong foundation in this area.

I have reviewed some of the research done by NUS as background for student policy in areas such as Fiscal Arrangements and Immigration. These are of generally good quality. Unlike many similar documents they are probably worthwhile reading for student politicians.

I have been unable to attend a NUS conference, but Hugh Christie (External Affairs Commissioner) and Reese Cosgrove (Alternate OFS Delegate) went to the Annual Conference of NUS in Winnipeg this summer as observers. They reported that the conference was well-run (although we had some difficulty getting materials in advance) and that enthusiasm on the part of members for the organization was high.

That conference saw the birth of National Students' Day. Many people, particularly this press, saw NSD as a failure. For those of us who had realistic expectations as to the degree of response that was to be expected, the day was a qualified success. In any case, the NUS plenary provided the spirit behind the day, and the NUS office produced comprehensive background papers, pamphlets and posters which proved to be of great assistance to campus committees. On the other hand there was an emphasis from the beginning on local autonomy; there was no attempt to run the show from NUS Central or to force either form or content onto local student associations.

There are, of course, some negative aspects to NUS. It is not as dynamic as I would like to see. But this is hard to condemn when there is widespread disinterest and disorganization on many campuses. An organization such as NUS derives its dynamism from the momentum of a strong support base. This provides yet another reason for joining NUS—to ensure that it will leave the requisite support on which to build its efforts.

Finally, I would be remiss if I did not remind Queen's students that we are generally regarded by our colleagues elsewhere as a conservative group. This characteristic often leads to a conflict between AMS policy and the policy of other student organizations. We have seen this with OFS. I am sure it will happen on occasion with NUS. It has always been my belief, however, that unless the differences are so extreme as to prevent meaningful communication, it is more beneficial to participate as a minority and ensure that our views are represented than to turn our backs and thrust our collective head into the sand.

I would not want to over-emphasize the potential for disagreement with NUS. They do not appear to be an extreme organization. What is more, they have a capacity to be objective, and they, too, realize that we will not always agree. We are not expected to nor is any member.

I have tried to present a fair analysis of NUS as I perceive it. Joining NUS has its benefits and its drawbacks. After considerable thought, I have come to the conclusion that on balance, Queen's should join NUS. It is worth $1.00 to each of us. I therefore recommend that you join me in voting, "yes" for NUS in the upcoming referendum.

Cannabis debate to be legal ...

or illegal?

by Peter Birt

National Affairs Reporter

Canadian University Press

OTTAWA (CUP) It will be two years ago, February 4, 1977 that discussion in committee began on the Government's Bill to amend the marijuana laws in Canada.

In that time the Bill has gone through the Senate's Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, suffered amendments, was returned to the Senate and passed. It went to the House of Commons on June 18, 1975. It hasn't been heard of since.

That Bill S-19 was "an act to amend the food and drugs act, the narcotic control act, and the criminal code."

"The intent of this legislation," according to Marc Lalonde, Minister of Health and Welfare in his testimony before the committee, "is to provide Canadian courts with needed flexibility in dealing with offences involving cannabis so that the penalties levied will be suited to the circumstances and significance of the offences."

A spokesman for the Minister said January 19, 1977 there had been "recent discussion of the whole matter" but Loraine Andras said she could not say what was going to happen to the Bill. She also said there was a possibility of some action in the matter at the end of January.

Interest in the legislation hasn't declined. According to Janet Ross of the Addiction Research Foundation of Ontario, studies show increased use of cannabis, especially among 18-29 year old men with university education and earning $15,000.

The Canadian Medical Association continues to "nag away" too, according to the CMA's director of scientific councils, Dr. J.S. Bennett blames "political expediency" on the lack of government action.

Even the chairman of the original Senate committee that studied the bill, Senator Carl Goldenberg doesn't know why no action has been taken by the Government.

He said that he knew the bill was "very controversial" but he said, "I thought I would have been told" if the amendments the Senate committee made were unacceptable to the government. He said he has heard "nothing whatsoever" about the bill since it passed the Senate two years ago.

The government now has at least three options.

It can put the amended Senate version of its bill on the House of Commons order paper and see that it soon comes up for debate.

It can introduce a new version of the bill and take it to the House of Commons for discussion.

Or it can simply drop the whole matter.

Debate on Bill S-19 began in Senate December 5, 1974. In those debates the purpose and limits of the bill were made clear.

Senator Neiman: "Honourable senators, on Tuesday of last week the Government introduced Bill S-19 in this chamber, by which it proposes to transfer the legislative provisions relating to cannabis from the narcotic control act to the food and drugs act and, in order to regulate those provisions more appropriately, to make amendments to the Criminal Code. I cannot stress too strongly that this bill does not make sativa legal, nor will it, I am sure, when the implications of these proposals are studied and fully understood, tend to encourage in any way the use of the substance in any of its forms."

In that speech the government makes its plans clear. During the course of witness testimony before the committee and in the debates in the Senate, proponents of the Bill repeatedly stated what the Government had been saying all along. This bill will change the category of offence that smoking marijuana is but it will not make an act which is illegal now, legal.

As Dr. Bennett of the C.M.A. said during the hearing, "Surely in this day and age it is practical to make something an offence without necessarily making it a criminal offence."

One of the key amendments made by the Senators to the original bill referred to importation of marijuana for personal use. The R.C.M.P. had objected to this clause and before the bill went back to the Commons the section was simply removed.

That section stated, "50 (1) except as authorized by this part of the regulations, no person shall import into Canada or export from Canada any cannabis," and later "except that subparagraph (b) (ii) (regarding penalties) does not apply where that person, after having been found guilty of the offence, establishes that he imported or exported the cannabis for his own consumption only."

The committee also recommended that first offenders would be given an absolute or conditional discharge after conviction for possession of marijuana.

Maximum penalties for importing or exporting would be reduced to 14 years less a day from the existing 14 years. The law now states that absolute or conditional discharges can only be granted in offences that carry a penalty of less than 14 years.

Not all the discussion in the Senate was so contentious however. One senator, (Sullivan) made his position on the whole matter very clear. "The use of soft drugs leads almost inevitably to the use of hard drugs. There is no such thing as simple possession of marijuana, I would remind Senator Neiman. They are all passing it on, or proselytizing. Furthermore, I am in favour of the death penalty for heroin traffickers. You know exactly where I stand," he said.

Another, Senator Lorne Bonnell, said "Marijuana has no medical use, and its effect on our young people between 14 and 20 cost our society dearly. These youngsters lose their initiative, drive, sense of purpose and their ambition to succeed." It was in this atmosphere that the Senate passed the amended Bill S-19.

U.S. president Jimmy Carter said he favored decriminalizing marijuana smoking - reducing the offense to a misdemeanor from a felony - but not its legalization.

Growing up in the States in the Sixties was an exciting time; a time when it seemed as if the questions were distinct and many and morally based, and the answers were ... well ... less distinct and few and sometimes admittedly amoral. The country was filled with political activity from one end to the other and from one end of the decade to the other. It began with the excitement and charisma of the Kennedys, and moved through the protest marches, Kent and Jackson State, the Columbia sit-ins, the Chicago Seven (nearly Eight), and of course most importantly, some of the causes for the political activity, both student-based and otherwise: the war, civil rights, the apparent inequality of the moon race and defense-offence spending versus internal economic poverty, and so on.

I look around now and this is gone. Student governments, by and large, no longer advocate or activate constituents to anarchy. A course union guide produced by OFS just a few years ago which suggested revolutionary methods now seems curiously out of date. It is appropriate, therefore, to reflect upon two things: 1) the needs of students today, and 2) the meaning of the phrase "student activism" in today's society and the changing role of student governments as articulators of the feelings of students.

needs have changed

The needs of the modern student have changed from those of the student of the sixties. To a great extent, this change has occurred as a result of the pressure of the worsened economic situation.

The primary need of the modern student is that of academic quality. Put simply, the time spent at a university or college must be "worth it" to the consumer. Evaluation and definition of "worth" may vary between individuals. For a student in a professional course, a school must provide, among other things, adequate useful preparation for further work and must have a good reputation to ensure ease in entering the job market. For a liberal arts and science student, the school community must provide, among other things, a forum of intellectual discourse. It is a wonder at times that any one institution can fulfill both these needs under the same roof!

Economic security is a strong need, but one which may be deferred until the future. Most, but not all, students attend university to maintain or better their chances for economic success.

The desire to make a contribution to society in some capacity is also a strong need in the student. It is presumably for this, ultimately, that a student attends a university or college.

What, then, of the articulation of these needs? Student activism now is definitely of a different ilk than that of the sixties. In fact, the phrase "student activism" is something of a misnomer if used in conjunction with student governments today, for in general they neither enjoy broad student support nor are they active, by 60's standards. An example is the National Student Day organized by the National Union of Students. In the first place, it was not national: most schools in Quebec, for example, did not have NSD. Where NSD was held, it saw minimal participation.

During the sixties, students - or rather student-age people - were a group and felt themselves to be such. Further more, they felt a moral responsibility as a group to effect social changes. Phrases such as "generation gap", "over 30", and the like emphasized the unity of students as a group.

Now, however, students do not perceive themselves so much as a class with separate interests but rather as parts of other classes or groups - the classes in which they were raised or the class toward which they are attempting to move.

Student governments, however, still attempt to articulate interests of students as a class, and they persist in attempting to convince students (and governments) that students have distinct class interests and concerns.

Thus the question must be asked if student governments are active in any way, is that activity resulting in a realistic articulation of the needs of students?

A further question arises. Is it possible for student governments to effectively represent the interests of their constituents? For example, at Queen's we have no full time student politicians. All politicians must be simultaneously, according to the AMS constitution, students (a fact which was decided in last year's Gray Affair). A part-time politician with little time to spend on political matters is no match for a full-time administrator, planner, or politician at any level. Looking back on the sixties, one must realize that many "student movement leaders" were non-students. Is this the only way student movements can succeed?

Student politicians, by and large, are much more conservative than their counterparts of a decade ago. Many advantages may have been gained by this shift, and many persons might view the change as a shift towards constructive action from destructive.

Yet I would charge that student governments, in that move, have done little more than emulate the governmental machinery, administrations, and corporate structures of the establishment interests. They have forsaken the excitement and enthusiasm of the sixties. They have erected mammoth, ponderous bureaucratic machinery. They are rarely student-populist, and under the weight of their bureaucracies they have ceased to be active.

Perhaps it was inevitable. When money for services tightened, student governments adopted a general policy of supplementing services. This required controls and careful overseeing and plenty of people to do it; thus came the formation of bureaucracies.

need for commitment

Lest it seem that I am endorsing too strongly the radicalism of the last decade and presenting too negatively the current state of student government, let me state the following. I do not advocate anarchy or destruction. I merely regret the growth of ponderous beasts who lack and are unable to generate enthusiasm for their movements. To quote Dr. J.A. Corry (in Farewell the Ivory Tower) "Some of the commitments students made are short lived, and also, to me, injudiciously chosen but not to be scorned on that account. Commitment with passions is miles ahead of neutrality and indifference."

Where will it go in the future? It appears that we are at a crossroads; two alternatives emerge. Either the student governments can remain large or grow and hire full-time professional student politicians, or the governments can tear down the bureaucracies, unify the voices of student representation which are presently quite disjointed, and try to recapture a grass roots enthusiasm I would strongly suggest the latter

Listener finds author "a brute"

Richler shoots in the dark

by Alan Listiak

Last Tuesday night we were treated to what we were told was a Super Special Treat: not only were we to hear Mordecai Richler expound in his usual "shocking, disgusting, scatological, dirty, clever, near-pornographic, funny, embarrassing, nauseating, bewildering, cynical, uninhibited, unruly, unabashed and very interesting" style his profoundities and acute observations on Writing in Canada, but this was his last stop for this year on The Tour.

However, what we came for and what we got were not exactly the same thing. We came to hear about Writing in Canada; instead we heard a 15 minute prologue travelogue of Boston, San Francisco, Detroit, Chicago, and London, the substance of which illustrated how poor old sensitive, successful, modest Mordecai was forced by ignorant publishers to put up with even more ignorant audiences and even more ignorant fellow authors. The point of this, it seemed, was to reveal to his audience this night the amazingly accurate and absolutely astounding fact that the Great Mordecai was one of The Tour's Token Canadians—but he didn't really mind.

Mr. Richler then went on to discuss some aspects of his long lost past, ostensibly to meet the 20 percent Canadian Content required by the C.R.T.C. We were informed of such insights as: schools and colleges attended by Richler were not so good but they're better now; wanting to be a writer in the 40's and 50's was kind of strange, but not so strange today; and, in particular, wanting to be Good and Successful meant leaving Canada, but not so much any more

And it is in these terms that it appears that Mr. Richler can best be come to terms with.

It is a matter of images and dependencies, the most important of which are captured suggestively by a metaphor at the centre of several of Mr. Richler's recent more "public" writings and which underlies his outspoken reputation. The August 14, 1976 issue of The Canadian ran a Richler article entitled, "Home Thoughts" and which was subtitled "The Bard of St. Urbain Street Shoots Again—From a Safe Distance" (obviously supplied by the editors). The October 30, 1976 issue of Weekend Magazine published "Pucksure" by Richler on the Canada Cup Hockey series. The obvious implication being: "He shoots! He scores!" The metaphor is shooting. While such a metaphor is probably abhorrent to Mr. Richler, it is nevertheless both apt and ironic.

but arrogant

There are a number of different kinds of shooters. At one end of the scale there is the Sportsman, whose image probably is best reflected in the English Gentleman who hunts big game in Africa, or, more tastefully, shoots traps while drinking tea and eating crumpets in the countryside. The Sportsman is sophisticated and sensitive; a man of mettle. Like Bobby Hull. In the middle of the scale is the Pot-shooter. The Pot-shooter is a sniper who sporadically sneaks in a shot at any target he can hit with ease. He is unprincipled, unorganized, undisciplined and lacks understanding of what he is doing.

Richler successful

In fact, this last point, that the 50's generation had to leave Canada but the present generation, riding the wave of Nationalism, has more opportunity to Make It In Canada appeared to be Mordecai's Major Message of the Murk (Night). But as the Mordecai we have come to know and love would weave his tale, appearances are deceiving for within this Major Message was the Main Message. The Main Message was this: Nationalism is a Good Thing but keep it in the realm of Economics; Culture is beyond the identity problems of adolescent countries; the Name of the Game is Excellence—BE GOOD AND THE WORLD WILL BEAT A PATH TO YOUR DOOR.

Mordecai Richler may or may not be a good writer—history will resolve that issue—but there is little doubt that he is Successful Success means recognition by someone significant and in Canada success means recognition by the Canadian Cultural Elite of the East. And what better way to achieve recognition by this Eastern Elite, which is really an English Elite, than by moving to the home of this Elite, namely, London.

In "Home Thoughts" he nails the Prime Minister for waffling on the New Society and the Liberals for their arrogance. He turns and with one gun fires on Joe Clark for lacking both imagination and presence. With the other gun let lets the NDP have it for going nowhere. He jumps up on the CN Tower and fires in opposite directions, blasting both the Maritimes and the West for bad food and cities and towns that are not like those of New England or like Paris. Dropping and hitting the floor, he feigns a shot at the Americans while wasting the Nationalists and the wrong-type of socialists for wanting to "flatten, cut off, shut out" those things which are more cultured and developed. While the smoke is clearing Mr. Richler worries that the Tories may fall in to the hands of some "know-nothing cowboys". In "Pucksure" he "authors" a goal against the expansionist NHL for weakening Canada's Game and writes his own assist by noting that the future of Hockey lies in international competition. Mr. Richler's targets at Queen's last week have already been noted.

It is true that these three occasions are not "literary" but they nevertheless provide examples of the man in action, in particular in action in the public arena. Look at those targets. They are so old and shot up by now that there isn't much of a challenge in them—at least not the way Mr. Richler approaches them. It's all been said before, too many times. The image of Mordecai Richler as a Sportsman writer-shooter is blatantly transparent. He is in fact a Gunslinger—a strange irony considering the complete disdain Mr. Richler has for the West and cowboys. He is arrogant: He brushes off a critic who honestly wonders about the symbolism in Duddy Kravitz by snapping that there isn't any, Kravitz was only a "slice of life". He buries the Maritimes and the West because they don't measure up to London, Paris, Nice, New England. He burns the socialists and Nationalists who want some reparation for having to live and down in the cow shit while the Elite don't even get their feet dirty living the "good life" (witty companions, fine books, first-rate food and wine, weekends in the country)."

He is a brute: If the hired gunman is a brute it is because he manipulates and exploits sentiment and sensitivity. He presents himself as unfeeling and hard, yet he knows he is dependent upon feeling and caring in others, he plays upon and develops elaborate strategies to encourage these frailties in others while minimizing them in himself. He cannot allow his dependence or his own sensitivities to be exposed. Mr. Richler's situation is much the same, only in reverse. He exploits insensitivity by presenting himself for sensitive and sentimental, artistic if you will. His dependence upon the coarse savages he finds particularly in the Nationalists, Maritimers and Westerners is covered by his arrogant comments, the more he mows them down, the more he reveals his sensitivity (read artistry)—and the more the sham of his sensitivity is covered. These people remain unrefined and undeveloped and no attempt is made to gain any understanding of or empathy with their reality and humanity.

gunslinger

He is a professional. It is clear that Mr. Richler doesn't care much for Canada. Sure he's Canadian, but that's not his fault. He was born here but that doesn't make him a Canadian. People in Canada may not know exactly what it means to be Canadian, but hopefully they can recognize an Englishman in Canadian clothing. The give-away is not only what he shoots at, but the way he shoots at it and what he shoots with. Mr. Richler fires the platitudes of the Eastern Elite who support and sustain him in the "good life" to which he is accustomed, and with whom he lays and drinks willingly. He is even more alienated than his Elite patrons whom he cannot seem to (or will not) out shoot. Only be Good and you will Make It, indeed.

selling "garbage"

Mordecai Richler's interest in Canada is purely functional. He actually says he only left London's luxury because he felt he needs a "sense of place" to inform his novels. Actually, it doesn't matter what place Canada's a good spot because he doesn't need a passport to get in, he knows a lot of the "right" people her, and he can make Good Money selling garbage to The Canadian, Weekend, and other starry-eyed, star-starved rags - as well as Eastern Elite Universities. At least the Dunning Hall ceiling had some symbolic sense, dropping down at the moment Richler recalled telling his school friends that he wanted to be a writer.

If I, an uncultured, unknown prairie dog, had submitted Mr. Richler's articles to The Canadian or Weekend I'd bet 1000 to 1 that they wouldn't get past the first editor's desk, much less achieve the lead position in the magazines with a full page colour illustration by Peter Swan and/or a full page colour photograph. If I had tried to pass off Mr. Richler's Tuesday night talk, the audience instead of tawing me and laughing at my jokes even before they were completed, would have jeered and jostled me out of the place. In fact, I wouldn't have the arrogance to make such attempts.

Gunslingers who engage in shoot-outs with rubber-tipped darts for ammunition and a slow trigger-finger don't often survive, even if they think they're at a "safe distance". Gunslingers of such incompetence also make the mistake of underestimating their targets.

Bang, Bang, Mordecai. You're dead

Artsview - on Campus and off

Saying "I like it" in 1,000 different ways.

by Eric Hughes

Reviewing is one of the toughest jobs one can have in the arts. It requires enough confidence to be able to believe that one's opinion is of consequence and enough humility to see that it isn't the ONLY one. It requires a thorough knowledge of the particular form of the work reviewed, and yet an acceptance of the fact that, no matter what the reviewer thinks of the piece, he could not do nearly as well himself. A good reviewer must be able to both praise his enemies and chastise his friends. In short, he must be able to be objective about the artist, the work, and most important, himself. Now, this is more an ideal than a rule of thumb. Just as one occasionally finds the perfect fit in a suit of clothes, one only occasionally finds a review in which the writer has obtained his ideal of objectivity. Personal prejudice against material, artist, location, time of day, even the weather can colour the way a reviewer sees a show or hears a concert. And we must add to this the idiosyncracies of the reviewer himself as they relate to what things he considers most important in a work.

In Kingston, we have a great variety of reviewers. There are those who look at shows for technical flaws; those who look to the writing or the setting up of the shows for mistakes, or causes for moments that don't work; those who give "gut reactions" or audience reactions; and those who merely describe what they saw. Certainly all of these approaches have their valid points; but some are more valid than others.

As far as I am concerned, the ideal review should have a bit of everything - something for everyone. We must remember that the reviews have to say something to the artists, those who have seen the show, and those who are looking for an objective opinion before seeing the show themselves.

In a recent symposium of reviewers in the United States, it was suggested that reviewers (and many of the participants could not agree as to whether even that TERM was valid, many preferring "critics") do little more than disseminate personal prejudices. In many cases this may be seen to be true, but I find it hard to believe that any human being could carry within himself that much vindictiveness or ill-feeling towards any group or individual.

Another question that was considered at this symposium was the question of whether or not there was any valid reason for having reviews at all. A good review in any paper can increase attendance, a bad review can have the opposite effect. I emphasize the CAN because it would be very forward for me or anyone else to assume that this is the case. I believe that the performers and artists more than the public at large are the people who read reviews. Do they do so to see whether there are things that should be changed? I certainly hope not. The artist should have enough integrity and confidence to retain the work in the form in which it was originally presented to the public. What is interesting to the artist, however, is to see articulated in print, the reactions of one individual - to see whether or not that person understood the intentions and effects of the presentation.

In many cases, the public will already have heard something about the show or concert before they read any review and will simply look to the review for corroboration of their original impressions. Hopefully, they too have enough integrity to go and view the offering themselves and to make up their own minds.

Reviewing, then, becomes an art form in itself. It does not necessarily have any effect beyond itself and the values that it contains. Therefore, the reviewer must have as much integrity, method and sensibility as the artists he is reviewing. He must also have some sympathy for what they are trying to achieve as, for the most part, his criticism cannot go beyond an evaluation of how close they came in achieving their goals.

"Year of the Cat"

By Sandy Graham.

And some of you are harmonies to all the notes and plays. Although we may not meet, still we know me well. While others talk in secret keys and transpose all I say, And nothing I do or try can get through the spell. The words are Al Stewart's and are taken from his latest album Year of the Cat and a song entitled "On stage before." There is a frustration in those words, a frustration which stems from years of virtual anonymity in the world of music. It is a reflection on the stage of the music industry today when artists of Stewart's calibre can find only limited audiences. An imaginative tunesmith and lyricist, Stewart writes above and beyond the work of others. This appears to be the chief reason for his lack of acceptance—he didn't until recently, fit the formula of AM radio, that electronic god of the airwaves who determines the likes and dislikes of millions.

On Year of the Cat, Al Stewart seems to be doing his best to fight his way out of obscurity and, happily, he is not going overboard. While his latest songs lack the urgency and mystery of such classics as "Nosadramus" and "Roads to Moscow," they still have something to say. They are of a much more personal nature and Stewart seems to have abandoned, at least temporarily, his roles as historian and philosopher. Only "On the Border" retains the sense of intrigue and impending tragedy which pervaded earlier albums. His new plan is to sing of personal anecdotes, real or imagined, certainly a more conventional approach. "If It Doesn't Come Naturally, Leave It" is a powerful discussion of personal will when one is "up to one's neck in the crumbling wreckage of all that he wanted from life." Six of the nine songs in some way involve the idea of travel and the album takes on a very itinerant feeling. The listener is a tourist in Stewart's mind, never staying long enough to really appreciate what is going on.

"Broadway Hotel" is the record's most challenging song and one seems to gain some new insight into it with each hearing. I still wouldn't like to go out on a limb and say I understand it, even though the beauty of Stewart's lyrics is that no one can ever accuse you of being totally wrong. He asks more questions on this album than ever before and supplies even fewer answers.

While the meaning and importance of Stewart's lyrics may not be so apparent, his use of imagery has increased. In the title cut, he describes his first impressions of the song's main character. "She comes out of the sun in a silk dress running like a watercolour in the rain." An adventurous pilot is said to be "caught up in the slipstream of the dare."

From a musical standpoint, Year of the Cat retains the excellence of earlier work. Stewart is a very chromatic writer who never insults his lyrics with inappropriate music. The songs change with the words, but at the same time, the melodies have their own input. I for one, was quite content with the dramatic acoustic guitar work Stewart was known for, but recognizing that he is seeking a broader base, his new arrangements are far from displeasing. He makes effective use of the guitars of Tim Renwick and Peter White, who can make their strings blaze or merely crackle politely depending on the song. The electric runs at the end of "On Stage Before" are exhilarating as are the acoustic embellishments in "On the Border."

Stewart has managed to mix a number of instruments on the cuts to obtain a well co-ordinated album. Part of the credit for this must go to Alan Parsons whose production is efficient and creative without being overbearing.

The interplay of musicians is best exemplified in "Year of the Cat," a gem of a song which tells all without revealing anything. It begins with a quiet piano which ambles across "the country where they turned back time" to create a fresh, magical atmosphere. It is joined by bass, guitars and drums in backing Stewart's soft voice which seems at once, both innocent and experienced. The instrumental break is fascinating: Andrew Powell orchestrates some beautiful rolling strings which stitch together first a strident acoustic guitar and then an electric guitar solo. A momentary calm precedes Phil Kenzie's alto sax which sends shivers up my back even now. It is a searing solo, the perfect compliment to "the river running through the year of the cat."

Al Stewart's abilities should have brought him into the spotlight long ago. This new album should be sufficient cat-lyst to get things rolling

McCartney album - a bargain selection

by Paul Murphy

As did the continent - wide summer tour which spawned this album, Wings Over America shows McCartney and company to be the completely professional and enjoyable outfit we had all expected them to be. I'll wager, however, that relatively few people reckoned for the shit-hot rock'n'roll band that Wings emerges as on the greater portion of this set.

It's all there, the 1976 road show - thirty songs from the ex-Beat Boy's past and present - collected for your convenience and listening pleasure on three long playing records. It's surely one of the few great values around for record buyers today, especially for those who've had to pass on previous McCartney releases because of limited vinyl budgets. Yet, the set goes equally recommended to those who have the original recordings.

You'll find no filler here; none of the long, extended jams that so often drag down live LP's. Wings get loose but never lose sight of where they're heading. The group's attempts to stretch out are never distracting or superfluous.

Neither is the album a bid to capitalize on the historical significance of McCartney's first American tour in a decade. It is much more than a souvenir documenting the event for those lucky enough to have attended the shows. Sure there is nostalgia. There's no mistaking the audience reaction to "the man's" return to the stage as McCartney eases into the opening lines of "Venus and Mars", but when the unit explodes into "Rock Show-Jet" the magic gives way to pure, uninhibited rock'n'roll. A short pause to catch their breath and Wings serve up a superb "Let Me Roll It", an extremely funky version of "Spirits of Ancient Egypt", and a scorching rendition of Jimmy McCulloch's "Medicine Jar". Joe English might well be playing 44 magnums, instead of drums, so muscular is his bashing of the skins. Paul's voice and his deliciously melodic bass work stand out throughout, and McCulloch's blistering guitar, in more than a few cases, is responsible for the band's inspired performances.

Each side of the album represents a fairly well-defined mood. Once the band has established themselves as some pretty boisterous rockers on side one, Paul switches to piano for the powerfully beautiful "Maybe I'm Amazed" and sets the tone for side two. Thoroughly enjoyable are Paul's Elvis-like vocal renderings (even more pronounced here than on the original recording) of "Lady Madonna"; a majestic "Long and Winding Road"; (which supplants the overblown strings of the Spector-produced original with a tasteful horn arrangement); and "Live and Let Die" - a tour de force even without the magnesium light bombs and strobe effects which accompanied the stage show.

Next comes the acoustic set featuring what is the emotional climax of the concert - "Yesterday" performed by McCartney himself. The rest of the set is pleasant enough, if predictable. Still, a foot-stomping blue grass rendition of "I've Just Seen a Face", and Denny Laine's sprightly handling of Paul Simon's "Richard Cory", inject elements of freshness and surprise.

Side four finds the band having some fun with a couple of novelty tunes from "Venue and Mars", along with "Go Now" from Laine's days with the Moody Blues. The latter certainly rates "classic" status and is a definite highlight here. Rounding out the side are a couple of giants from Wings' highpoint here. McCartney has rarely sung with the conviction and raw string of hit singles. McCartney has rarely sung with the conviction and raw string of hit singles. McCartney has rarely sung with the conviction and raw string of hit singles. McCartney has rarely sung with the conviction and raw string of hit singles.

The only section of the entire trilogy that I have any reservations at all

Classics and the rest

Saturday, February 5.

The Grant Hall Series features The Toronto Mendelssohn Choir. Elmer Iseler, Canada's moving force in choral music has brought international acclaim to his country, choir and himself. The 175 voice ensemble is equally at home in Baroque or contemporary music. Tickets available from the Performing Arts Box Office in the John Deutsch University Centre (547-6194) or at the door the evening of the performance at Grant Hall, 8.30 p.m.

Sunday, February 6

The Kingston Symphony Orchestra features Julie Holtzman, the talented Canadian pianist, who will be making her return engagement to Kingston at the Grand Theatre. Critics talk about the soul, imagination and the passion of this young performer. She will be playing Gershwin's most popular classical work, the Rhapsody in Blue, the work that too many critics has exemplified the melting-pot life of America. That's Sunday in the Grand Theatre. Also performed will be Schubert's Unfinished Symphony.

Wednesday, February 9.

A February special - Mummenschanz - the Swiss mime-mask troupe, returns to Kingston's Grand Theatre for an evening of entertainment for adults and children alike. Tickets may be purchased at the Performing Arts Box Office in the John Deutsch University Centre, (547-6194) or at the Grand about is side five. Unlike many people I know who saw nothing good about the Speed of Sound LP, I liked it. However, the very songs that I thought would be knock-outs in concert don't come off as well as in their original studio environment.

"Let 'Em In" consists basically of a simple melodic theme being put through its carefully arranged paces. The original recording was saved from through its carefully arranged paces. The original recording was saved from through its carefully arranged paces. The original recording was saved from through its carefully arranged paces. The original recording was saved from through its carefully arranged paces.

Still, these disappointments do little to quell the effects of the high-powered rock'n'roll assault which awaits the listener on the album's final side. "Letting Go", like "Rock Show", is an excellent concert vehicle. "Band on the Run" provides the appropriate closing for a more than two hour, non-stop show. For an encore there is a super-charged "Hi, Hi, Hi", and a previously unrecorded piece which represents somewhat of a departure from the usual McCartney fare - a crashing, metallic finale called "Soliel".

There's little to squabble about with this album. Wings proved that as players they can hold their own on stage (even Linda) with anyone in the business. Selection-wise, although I personally mourn the exclusion of "Junior's Farm" (included in Wings' British warm-up tour) and "Helen Wheels" (performed in Toronto), the bulk of McCartney's post-Beatle work is represented here, and, Wings Over America can certainly be considered the 'best of' Paul McCartney and Wings.

French and Drama

Hell and Romance

This week, the department of French is presenting two French plays in Room 102 of Theological Hall.

On February 3, 4, and 5 at 8.30, the play Huis Clos will be performed. It was written by the famous French playwright, novelist and philosopher, Jean Paul Sartre. In it, three people find themselves in an elegant room from which they cannot escape. It has been chosen especially for them, just as they have been chosen especially for each other. This is their own personal hell.

Director Heather Dick is very interested in Sartre's famous existential philosophy and its embodiment in the play's theme of "hell is other people." She is hoping to put across the play's "inherent values by acting it and in examining the dynamic possibilities of written text through performance."

On the 6th and 7th of February, two plays by Musset will be performed: Les Caprices de Marianne and Il faut qu'une porte soit ouverte ou fermée. In these two plays, Musset explores his philosophies of love as a game - both its tragic and (mostly) its comic qualities.

Both plays deal with the loves of the "haut monde", (not surprising when one considers Musset's own interesting love life, including his famous romance with George Sand); and both are "spectacles dans un fauteuil", that is, plays intended to be read and not acted. It should therefore be interesting to see how the problems of staging them are handled by director Pat Soberman.

Both sets of plays will be performed in room 102 of the Drama Department, with the Sartre at 8.30 on the specified days and the Musset at 7.30. Admission is free to all performances.

Theatre: Tickets are $4, $5 with a $1 discount for students and senior citizens at The Grand Theatre, 8.30 p.m.

Friday, February 11.

The Vibrant Stage Series features Baldoon - a new play by one of Canada's leading playwrights and poets - James Reaney, and Marty Gervais, about true events between 1830-40 from the Wallaceburg area of Southern Ontario. Tickets at the Performing Arts Box Office or at the Grand Theatre - show time 8.30 p.m.

Badminton braves blizzard

Gals thrive on good times

by Diana Edwards

Blizzard conditions and freezing cold weather greeted our Queen's women's intercollegiate badminton team this weekend in St. Catharines. And it was some weekend!

Of the nine teams who were supposed to play in the Post-Christmas Combined tournament only 4 teams—Queen's, Brock, Waterloo and Ryerson—were able to turn up. Brock decided at noon to cancel the tournament.

Some of the highlights of the resulting casual play were: the 1st doubles team of Betsy Carey and Sandy Koerner, besides wiping out the areas at the refreshment table, challenged and defeated the Brock 1st doubles team; Betsy then teamed with manager Laurel McIntyre and almost beat the 1st doubles team from Waterloo. Second doubles team Diana Edwards and Gayle Raycraft managed to win a 3-game match against the Brock 2nd doubles team.

Even coach Bernie Houghton got into the action, playing in a mixed doubles match with 5th singles player Bev Koski, 6th singles Linde Stemp, and a member from the Brock men's intercollegiate badminton team. After cleaning up in the mixed competition, Bernie was challenged by the Brock male badminton player to a couple of games of men's singles. In return for his friendly gesture, Bernie soundly defeated the fellow. Then the Brock player decided to play what he thought was lesser singles competition, Queen's 1st singles Diana Edwards, and to his surprise (and hers too) he was again soundly defeated!

The outcome of the weekend is such: we were supposed to play 2 tournaments this term to determine by accumulated points, who the team and individual winners will be. This weekend's cancelled tournament forces the next tournament to be the only and final deciding competition for this term.

In 2 weeks hence the OWIAA finals will be held at Guelph. There, we hope to win enough matches to increase our team point total to Lynch that one point lead that the 1st place Western U. team has on us now.

York uncorks guns on Gaels

Mark S. Bennett

To play or not to play, that was the question. For the Hockey Gaels everyone got their wish. Friday's game against the U. of T. Blues had to be postponed due to a small weather disturbance while Saturday's encounter against York was completed with Queen's ending up on the short side of a 9-2 score.

The decision to travel to York was not made until Saturday morning whereupon seventeen weary hockey players were made to spend four hours on the bus prior to the game. Knowing that York, number one in the country, had lost to U. of T. on Tuesday night and remembering the 11-1 thrashing that Queen's was handed last time they visited the Ice Palace, did nothing to aid the cause.

Coach Mike Babcock, attempting to instill some life into the scoring column made numerous changes for Saturday's game. The most notable of these was the installment of Jeff Beck between the pipes. Beck, the forgotten man on the Gael's squad this year, rose to the occasion and turned in a stellar performance although the score does not reflect as such. The presence of the young, mobile goaltender seemed to lift many of his teammates spirits and desire.

Along with Beck, the MacIntyre brothers John and Ned, played their best hockey of the season. Superb penalty killing was the order of the day for this twosome from Arnprior. John even managed to score the games opening goal as he beat Peter Kostek on Terry Angel's passout. Angel, converted to right wing from centre, along with the MacIntyres provided most of the bright lights offensively for the Gaels.

York, leading the OUAA East in practically every department, found the going tough in the first period escaping to the dressing room even at one goal apiece. The roof started to leak in the second frame as Brian Burtch, Ron Hawkshaw and Jim Maisin pulled York into a lead they never relinquished. The ceiling collapsed in the third as five York marksmen found the range while

Alpine Gaels show depth with yet another triumph

Queen's alpine racers won again last Friday at Blue Mountain, Collingwood, when they won the men's giant slalom hosted by Trent University. This was their second successive triumph in the Ontario Universities Alpine Series. A field of 72 racers represented eleven schools.

The Queen's team demonstrated its depth once again by grouping finishers in the top ten. The race was won by Mark Bell of the University of Toronto in a fast time of 58.89 seconds with Ted Yard of Wilfrid Laurier 2nd in 60.05 seconds. Reid Drury of Queen's was 3rd with 60.22 and thus won the bronze medal. Fourth and fifth places went to two more Queensmen - Tim Wardrop in 60.62 seconds and Brian Fitzpatrick in 60.63 - only one-hundredth of a second apart. Bill Hartman finished in 14th place and Rob Dakers in 19th. Rob Gripper had problems with a gate in the upper part of the course and could only manage a relatively slow time.

The race was run in bitter cold and sporadic blizzard conditions and it is surprising that some racers didn't get lost on the hill.

Overall, Queen's had a comfortable lead of 21 points over their closest rival, Toronto. The men's team results were as follows:

1. Queens	154 points
2. Toronto	133 points
3. Western	116 points
4. Wilfrid Laurier	104 points
5. Waterloo	96 points
6. York	95 points
7. Guelph	78 points
8. McMaster	74 points
9. Brock	59 points
10. Trent A	33 points
11. Trent B	2 points

The Women's team came 4th in team standings behind Toronto, Waterloo, and Western. Sue Graves of Waterloo and a former National Team member won the race and Toronto accounted for 2nd, 3rd, and 4th places. Jane McGillivray of Queen's took 5th place.

In the series standings to date, the Queen's girls are tied with Guelph for 3rd spot and Jane McGillivray is tied for 2nd place, individually. The men are well out in front in 1st place after two races.

Dale Sandles replied for Queen's

Being beaten by York is certainly no disgrace and the Gaels never stopped trying. The difference between the two clubs was Queen's inability to cash in on scoring opportunities presented them. On one occasion Joe Pecaric, now a forward, and Gary Brandt had three whacks at the puck on Kostek's doorstep but couldn't score. York on the other hand scored four times from the slot where the forwards were allowed to roam at will.

Again, questionable officiating detracted from what started as a good hockey game. Bob Wasson of York pummeled Jay Babcock to the ice in the first period and Brandt suffered the same fate in the third. A credit to both Queen's players is the fact that neither of them attempted any retaliation. The OUAA rules state any fighting, that is even a one punch affair, results in a game misconduct. The two scraps resulted in both York players getting minor penalties for roughing.

The loss dimmed the Gael's playoff chance and depending on the outcome of Laurentian's weekend contests, the candle might have been snuffed. Tonight the RMC Redmen visit the Jock Hartly Arena in a league contest. Friday McMaster comes to town for an exhibition game followed on Saturday by Trent. The Gaels, fighting for those invaluable points are sure to play exciting hockey. Why not come and support them?

Mobile rookie Jeff Beck thwarts rush but York wins 9-2.

Amateurs lack aid -

Cac's Corner -

We're rich, fat and lazy

by Chris Chenoweth

The standing joke among Canadians today is that we have the physical stamina of most 70-year-old Swedes. Sadly, government tests run during the "Participation" physical fitness program proved that the average Canadian may indeed be closer to most 80-year-old Swedes in physical build and endurance.

The problem isn't that all Canadians smoke MacDonald's Tobacco, and therefore don't have the wind to even jog a mile. The truth behind the great Canadian bulge is simply that the average citizen would rather watch Hockey Night in Canada on T.V. than play the game.

Sure, the weather is usually ridiculous, and who wants to go outside when it's -10 C? (or is that -10 F?) But admit it, even when it is a fine, sunny day most people prefer to watch Muhammad Ali run around a boxing ring for ABC's Wide World of Sports than to grab a stick and play shinny outside.

Television has killed the public's desire for everyday exercise. But this is not the only problem which Canadian sports face today. The much more serious dilemma is that few of those same armchair athletes are willing to back those Canadians who do desire to participate and compete at the amateur level with cash contributions. Basically, the chubby man on the street gives little in the way of financial support to these organizations which provide facilities for those desiring physical fitness.

Hence, the amateur sportsman (and woman) is a dying breed in the country. Let's use the recent Olympics in Montreal as an example of the kind of problems which amateur sports face in general.

When the city of Montreal was granted the Olympics in 1968, everybody was excited about the Western warm-up for skating team

by Tom Shand

On February 11 and 12 Queen's will be hosting the OUA Figure Skating Championships. If present trends continue that competition will need look no further than its host team for its winner. The Queen's team, coached by Nancy Brennan, seems to be getting stronger with every outing. The Western Invitational on January 21 turned out to be a perfect showcase for its talents.

The Queen's team skated away with first place finishes in seven of the sixteen events, and outpointed second place Western 136 to 118 Toronto, York, and MacMaster also competed but were not in the same league as the top teams.

Victories were registered by Julie Ringma and Peter Sibbald (Novice Mixed), Patti McLean (Novice Ladies), Sandy Blainey (Junior Ladies), Patti Shirkoff (Junior Interpretative), Johnanna Flipsen and Jan McGillivray (Junior Similar Pairs).

prospects of a world sporting event coming to our country. But when attempts were made to form regional clubs which would provide our amateur athletes with facilities in which to train, few Canadians cared enough to reach into their pockets to contribute even a dime. The only way a citizen could be coerced into donating to the cause was by the promise of millions if "you bought into our Olympic Lottery" or if Olympic coins and stamps were bought.

The government stood by and gave little encouragement or direction to the development of amateur athletics. As a result, athletes such as Abby Hoffman were almost forced to drop out of Olympic competition because they could not afford to train properly while still holding a job. Had some spirited Canadians contributed towards a fund to aid our amateur athletes, Ms. Hoffman and others could have concentrated more on training and less on worrying about their next meal.

If supporting the amateur competition is not to your liking, what about the dilemma which faces voluntary ski associations such as the Canadian Ski Patrol? The Ski Patrol is a valuable public service organization which patrols the ski hills, and aids those skiers who experience accidents while on the slopes. Last year many local ski patrols in Quebec almost went bankrupt due to a lack of public contributions. Their funding campaign fell far short of the goal needed to continue operations. Only intervention by the federal government in the form of an LIP grant managed to save those patrols which were in jeopardy. This year the Patrol again faces the same shortage of cash.

The examples of non-support for amateur athletics are endless. If the majority of people desire the armchair approach, then that is their own choice and business. However, when the average Canadian can't even afford a 25c donation for amateur organizations, or for programs which do encourage participation and exercise, then something is wrong with our way of thinking.

Cathy Wild (Intermediate Ladies) and Larry Benz (who skated to standards to win the Novice Men's in which he was the only competitor. Shirkoff's performance which also included gaining the runnerup position in the Senior Similar Pairs with Marilyn Snell was all the more incredible because she was skating with a concussion.

Other strong showings came from Carolyn Clayton who captured a second and two thirds, Steve McCutcheon who placed second in the Intermediate and Senior Men's Categories, and last but not least Vickie Cleworth who landed a fourth in the very tough Senior Interpretative and came a close second in the Senior Ladies Division.

PM's challenge

Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau challenged Quebec Premier Rene Levesque to hold a single, decisive referendum on Quebec independence, with the political career of both men riding on the outcome. Mr. Trudeau claimed that he would leave federal politics if the outcome was for independence, and he called on "others" to resign if the results went the other way.

The speech was made to the Quebec Chamber of Commerce who broke into applause several times. The Prime Minister's Quebec visit is seen as a prelude to five federal by-elections which are expected to be called in the near future.

Mr. Levesque said he would not reply to Trudeau's challenge and accused him of trying to use the five federal by-elections as mini-referendums. He also pointed out that Mr. Trudeau seemed to have agreed that the only way to clarify the situation in Quebec was by holding a referendum.

Schoolboard fight

The Frontenac County Board of Education is opposed to the Kingston Township's official plan which has designated land north of Frontenac Mall as residential and thus fit for a 681-unit subdivision development now being proposed.

First of all the area is fraught with hazards to children including the Canadian National Railway's main line in the northern area, the Cataract Creek flowing to the east, and a spur line of the railway on the southern limits. Secondly the nearest school would be almost two miles distant, and the area is too small to justify having its own school.

Reeve Beeman commented that the project is in too undecided a state at the moment for any decisions or objections to be warranted.

French push

A delegation of concerned teachers and parents will present a request to the school board education committee asking that French be taught to pupils in Grades 1 to 4.

French is now taught in Grades 5-13, and 44 percent of students in the area supervised by the Frontenac

Cold comfort

The United States and Canada have signed a treaty assuring uninterrupted flow of natural gas across each others' territory. It was also disclosed that letters of thanks were being sent from Washington to Prime Minister Trudeau, for his prompt reaction to the energy crisis in the U.S. The National Energy Board approved emergency supplies of oil and gas to the U.S. within five days of receiving appeals from U.S. energy companies. U.S. officials noted that it was the quickest they had ever known approval to be given, and the gas price charged was the same as the regular price. The Federal Power Commission had just turned down an application by Tennessee Gas to raise gas prices for an emergency gas contract.

Driving recommendations

The Ontario Legislature's Select Committee on Highway Safety is considering recommending lowering the legal impairment level for teenage drivers, a five-year period for new drivers, and making learning permits available to 15 year olds.

The principle of the probation period is supported by Ontario Attorney-General Roy McMurtry, but his plan would have drivers lose their licences if they accumulated half the points normally needed to lose their licence (15) in the first two years, instead of the 9 in the first five years recommended by the committee.

The reduced alcohol level will probably be .06, or 60 milligrams of alcohol per 100 millilitres of blood. Other recommendations include medical certificates at age 45, eyesight examinations at age 70, and permits that restrict older people to daylight, to a limited area and to local routes.

Gas increases

Gasoline prices will increase by 3 to 3.5 cents a gallon on March 2nd, and oil companies are trying to get AIB approval to tack on another half cent a gallon in Eastern Ontario and Western Quebec. The price of other petroleum products will be going up by similar amounts.

The price increase reflects the 70 cents per barrel rise in domestic oil prices that came into effect on January 1; the corresponding decrease in federal Government compensation for imported crude oil; and the four-cent-per-barrel adjustment in Alberta crude oil prices effective November 1.

Spanish protest

The death of three Communist lawyers slain by rightists caused nation-wide labour strikes in Spain, in protest of a campaign of violence by diehard Francoists. Huge crowds of mourners gathered to watch the funeral.

Labor sources said that over 300,000 workers participated in the protest against the efforts of followers of the late General Franco to weaken efforts of Premier Suarez to liberalize the country. Mr. Suarez called off a Middle East trip to consider policies to cope with Spain's worst political crises since General Franco died 14 months ago.

The Socialists, the illegal Spanish Communist Party, and other leftists urged their followers to stay off the streets and disown the call for a national protest strike. The extreme right fears that the reform program of Mr. Suarez and King Juan Carlos will open the door to leftist participation. The key reform is Spain's first free parliamentary election in four decades, scheduled for sometime this spring.

Scottish trip

Allie Pierce, noted Queen's figure, recently paid a visit to the snowy shores of Loch Ness in Scotland. While out for a swim he caught a ride with Nessie. "Her papier mache is getting a little soggy but her spirit is as buoyant as ever."

CRTC challenged

Three Buffalo television stations have appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada to reverse a lower court decision that the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission could order cable systems to delete commercials on the American stations. The Commission first authorized commercial deletions in 1971, so Canadian advertisers wouldn't buy time on American television that could be picked up by Canadian cable companies.

The lawyer for the Buffalo stations told the Supreme Court that the CRTC has no authority over cable companies since they are not broadcasting companies or broadcasters.

Odds and ends

Naomi Neely in the United States is trying for control of Robert Neiderhiser's estate. He collapsed and died in the middle of their wedding ceremony, and now the question is, did he live until the pair were actually joined in wedlock?

Henry Lacy, a faith healer in the United States, has offered to use his powers to stop the cold and snow if the department of motor vehicles gives him back his driver's licence. The 86 year-old American lost his licence in 1974, and he claims he has lately been "experimenting" with the weather and may be able to improve it.

In 1939 only 14 whooping cranes were known to exist in the world. In 1961 a conservation program was initiated to save the birds, and now the Saskatchewan Museum of Nature reports that there are 99 whooping cranes in the world, 76 in the wild and 23 in captivity. This is the highest number of the birds since 1961.

"Virginity doesn't equal insanity"

Ms. Greer blasts Western sexual obsession

by Denis Champagne

Genital obsession is being confused with sexual health by many women in Western society, according to Dr. Germaine Greer who spoke on 'Feminism and Fertility' to a capacity audience in Grant Hall Tuesday evening.

"This is the most fucked race of women in the history of the world", Dr. Greer stated. She referred to the advent of uncomplicated contraceptive devices and medications such as the pill as being instrumental in leading women to "having a vested interest in being sexually active."

Stressing that women are underinformed about a large part of their lives she proposed that women re-evaluate their priorities. The feminist cry for control over our own bodies was an oversimplification, according to the noted author and feminist, "because our bodies refuse to be controlled and we have no right to do it."

Comparing various societies she said that the priority we place on "intromission" is extreme. Acceptance of the modern technological promise of eternal physically controlled pleasure by women "may be a serious mistake."

Take control. Urging women to take control of their own situation she condemned their tendency to consider a contraceptive as "terrific" if it simply works. She warned that the pill is a powerful medication which interferes with the delicate cycle of a female and is an agent in diseases such as pelvic inflammatory disease.

Feminist Germaine Greer told a capacity crowd in Grant Hall last Tuesday night to study the pill more and assess tradeoff between pill damage and orgasm.

"I'm asking you to consider you're motives. I'm asking you to study the pill more and assess the mathematics between pill damage and orgasm", she continued. Other contraceptive devices such as the I.U.D. also have harmful side effects. Abortion, according to Dr. Greer, should be used as a last resort only when it is necessary "because we should not create a fetus only to destroy it."

Increased tertiary education, women's centres and a decrease in sexual activity were offered as possible solutions to the feminine fertility problem. "Stop putting foreign bodies inside yourself," she urged women, "and that includes the penis."

The right to sex and its association with contraceptives has led to the placement of the sexual performance ethic as a priority by "deep seated masochistic women." Elaborating, Dr. Greer stated, "It may be that men are also victims of the performance ethic. Modern opinion wrongly equates virginity with insanity."

Technological child's play. She advocated the expanded role of technology in relation to the development of more suitable methods of contraception, inferring that the creation of such items was

"child's play" in this advanced technological age.

Addressing herself to a question from the audience dealing with the role of love in her discussion, she replied, "Love and fertility don't have much to do with each other until the baby comes." A question relating to the disposition of males with reference to the topic led Dr. Greer to say, "I don't have much concern for the feelings of men anymore."

Reflecting Canada's ethnic makeup, questions following the lecture were in both French and English. Dr. Greer responded accordingly. When asked to translate she replied, "Now listen, this country is supposed to be bilingual. It always gives me a pain that only the French speaking people are bilingual."

Dr. Greer, 38, author of the best selling book, The Female Eunuch, is a Ph.D. graduate in English from Cambridge University. Since 1970 she has been at the forefront of the international feminist movement.

Majority of Ontarions disagree with fee hike Gov't study reveals

by Gord Graham

TORONTO—(CUP) Fifty-four percent of the Ontario electorate believe that university fees should not be raised, according to a government report released in January.

The study, produced jointly by the Ministry of Education and the Ministry of Colleges and Universities, also showed over three quarters of the students surveyed were opposed to any tuition hike. About 10 percent of the students and public felt a fee increase was justified.

Couldn't Decide. These results were obtained before August of last year, months before next year's tuition increases had been announced.

Asked whether universities received enough public funds, about 50 percent of the voters couldn't decide one way or the other, while the same number thought present funding levels were sufficient. Only 18 percent of the public questioned felt that Ontario's universities were underfunded.

Alan Golombek, information officer for the Ontario Federation of Students, commented, "The public doesn't seem to want fees to go up or the government to pump more money into education—the obvious interpretation of this result is that they feel the universities are adequately funded now."

The study took over a year and $619,000 to produce. Titled "The Secondary-Post-Secondary Interface," it runs more than 1,750 pages with even weightier appendices to be released to libraries.

Study Blasted. The report has been blasted by New Democratic education critic Jim Foulkes as "both studied and presented in a vacuum, unrelated to work experience... or previous learning experiences" of students. He also criticized the study for "failing to treat education in the context of the economy as a whole."

The study was intended to be used as a basis for an overall policy review of Ontario's educational system by the two ministries involved. Foulkes was critical of the government for not yet delineating "the makeup and terms of reference" of the review committee.

University students themselves were split on the question of whether enough funds were going to basic language and mathematical skills should be developed through secondary schools, vocational training should take place in community colleges, and academic and professional knowledge should be imparted by universities.

Students disagreed with their faculty on other roles of the university. Many saw "the development of creativity and problem solving" and the "fostering of social responsibilities" as vital goals for the universities to pursue.

But the report concludes that "neither the universities nor secondary schools are regarded by training should take place in community colleges, and academic and professional knowledge should be imparted by universities."

At the same time, roughly one third of the faculty surveyed thought the universities should be more

More join differential cause

OTTAWA [CUP] — The McMaster University board of governors has joined two universities in Ontario in rejecting differential fees for visa students. Lakehead University has bowed to the government.

"Make no mistake about it, the government is calling the shots," said Lakehead vice-president administration Byron Mason, noting that the university's size and location makes it difficult to absorb the extra costs. McMaster, along with Carleton and Laurentian will absorb the costs for at least another year.

According to president Arthur Bourns, the move was intended "to protect the financial integrity of the university," but, he added, "the fee will have to be charged if a solution cannot be found."

Five per cent of the total university enrolment in Ontario is foreign students. At McMaster, the percentage is slightly higher at 6.4 per cent, but Bourns said there are several reasons for this.

One reason he mentioned is that McMaster places a great emphasis on its graduate programs and the 20 per cent visa student enrolment "provides cultural and academic enrichments."

WASHINGTON D.C. [ZNS-CUP] — A German weekly magazine claims that the Pentagon has a secret contingency plan, code-named "Project Camelot", which calls for "an American blockade of Quebec by land, sea and water should the province ever secede" from Canada.

The magazine Der Spiegel, published in Hamburg, alleges that the plan exists because Canadian observers and top U.S. military officials fear that Quebec could become another Cuba.

The Der Spiegel article, which was republished in the US this week by Atlas World Press Review, says "one can only speculate how president Carter would react to (Quebec's secession). But for years the Pentagon has maintained a thick file labeled 'Project Camelot'. This secret document sees Canada as a 'danger spot' on par with Africa and Latin America and calls for an American blockade of Quebec ... should the province ever secede."

Tomato dropped 6 ft. undamaged

NEW YORK [ENS-CUP] — The US tomato industry has come up with a tougher tomato.

It's called MH-1 and according to New Yorker magazine, can be thrown six feet into the air and fall on concrete without damage.

The fruit was developed to withstand rough handling by sorting machines and mechanical pickers as well as reduce transport damage.

Contraceptive to render male temporarily sterile

A UBC social scientist and doctor is beginning tests of a new male contraceptive taken by injection.

Dr. Robin Percival-Smith, of the department of obstetrics and gynecology, and Morton Warner, assistant professor of health care and epidemiology, are seeking 24 volunteers for a program of monthly injections with two hormones designed to decrease sperm production.

The tests, to be administered at UBC's student health services, are part of a world wide series administered by the World Health Organization. It is the first series of tests of the contraceptive on humans.

The hormones—one an androgen and one a gestagen—have been used for years for other uses. They act to reduce the sperm count enough to render the man temporarily sterile.

But Percival-Smith said the volunteers need not worry about their sperm count not returning to normal after the test period.

He said it will probably be 10 years before the hormones are marketed, perhaps in pill form. The reason for the long delay is the necessity for extensive testing to make sure there are no adverse side effects, he said.

Percival-Smith said the only side effects he can predict in the short term are an outbreak of acne, slight swelling around the nipples and a slight weight gain.

Researchers are seeking males between 30 and 40 years of age for the tests, preferably men who are considering vasectomy. A vasectomy is an operation to tie off the sperm tubes.

Volunteers will attend a preparatory clinic every two weeks for three months before testing begins. When testing begins, volunteers will go to the clinic once a month for injections and once every two weeks to have their sperm counts checked.

After two months of injections the sperm count should have reached a reproductive level, but Percival-Smith suggests the volunteers' sex partners continue to use some type of birth control as a safety measure.

After the tests are over, he said, it will be about three months before the volunteers become fertile again.

Percival-Smith said the main advantage of this form of contraception, if it proves effective, is that it is inexpensive and it shifts responsibility of birth control to the male.

"Men have always thought that it is the woman's place to use the contraceptive. This would change all that."

"The women's movement may well have stuck a pin in someone to get this research going."

Percival-Smith said the hormones are already being tested on volunteers in Toronto, where they are being taken daily in pill form.

Warner is involved in the project to monitor the "acceptance level" of the drug among volunteers. He will interview them to determine whether taking the contraceptive will affect the volunteers' level of sexual activity, their psychological behaviour or relationships with their sex partners.

"These tests were never done when the female pill was being developed," Warner said.

The World Health Organization is funding the project for two years at a cost of $52,000.

OSAP equitable here

by Annette Nicholson

Of 4150 students that applied to the Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP) this past year, 3520 received aid, Mrs. Doris Laughton, Assistant Registrar (Student Awards) told the Journal. This figure is roughly equivalent to the national average of 35 per cent of students that receive financial assistance to attend post-secondary institutions.

Assessments are made with such considerations as family income, the number of dependents, and the expected cost of the academic year. Students are divided into two categories, dependent and independent. To qualify as independent students must have either completed four years of post-secondary study, or 2 consecutive full years in the work force, or be married. A parental contribution is expected of students not classified as independent.

The Student Advocate (November 1976) has criticized the Student Assistance Program method of assessment: "Nonetheless the assessment procedure continues to be overrun with rigid and arbitrary criteria and an increasing use of supplementary application and appeal schedules to the point where large numbers of students are being denied assistance."

But many students at Queen's are using the appeal procedure and if they submit the proper documentation, are successful in their appeals, explained Mrs. Laughton. For example, if a student had been sick or unable to get a summer job, then his assessment would likely be changed, she said.

Of the 4150 students that applied only 421 were refused any aid. Others never completed or withdrew their applications, explained Mrs. Laughton.

There have been problems with delays in granting assistance, but if a student submits his application early he will probably receive his assistance by the beginning of term, she said.

Queen's has an assistance fund, valued at $162,025 in 1975-1976, the bulk of which is used for short-term loans (90 days) and the remainder for general loans to students genuinely needing assistance but who do not qualify under the government programs. Contributions to the fund include the AMS and Abramsky's Interest free short-term loans are usually made available to students awaiting their OSAP loans.

No changes in residency or citizenship requirements are to be made regarding eligibility for the Alumni National Scholarships.

The Senate Committee on Scholarships and Student Aid, following a request in December to review the eligibility situation, reported to Thursday's Senate meeting that present requirements are not overly restrictive.

Dr. A. McChie (Psychology) speaking on behalf of the Committee said that the requirements for the scholarships do not restrict applicants by citizenship but rather by residency. The scholarships are open to "residents of Canada, children of Queen's graduates resident abroad, and children of Canadian citizens resident abroad, who meet the entrance requirements of the University."

The Committee concluded that "residents of Canada" need not be Canadian citizens.

Also continued was the prerequisite of a first class standing for renewal of any Alumni National Scholarship. The report, stated that Queen's requirements were similar to those at other universities and Mr. McChie explained that there have only been two cases where Alumni Scholars could not maintain a first class standing.

Exceptions to this rule could be made "where sufficient extenuating circumstances existed," such as illness and students who failed to meet renewal standards would be able to regain a suspended scholarship in a subsequent academic year.

Blood clinic draws 407

Wednesday's Engineering Society Red Cross Blood Donor Clinic may have broken a record for the most pints given in one afternoon in the Ottawa-Kingston area, said Engineering Society Secretary Steve Greey. It was "more than successful."

There were long lineups and as a result the clinic closed at 5:30 instead of 4. Greey estimated the number of pints received at 407, while 200 are necessary to make a clinic worthwhile.

universities with a 2 to 1 margin in disagreement and almost a third undecided. Forty percent thought money given to universities now was being well spent, and over a quarter thought not.

Few Surprises

Survey groups were small, numbering about 1000 voters and only a third that many students. High school teachers and college and university faculty interviewed totalled 1400.

The results contained few other surprises. A general arts education is now seen as having little value by nearly half the public and students alike. Everyone surveyed felt that Contained within the bulky report is the conclusion based on attitudinal and achievement testing at high schools, that "a sizeable proportion of francophone students" who left high school to go to work did so only because a post-secondary program of interest to them was not available in the province.

Another part of the study recommends "a thorough evaluation of the current status of educational opportunities for French-speaking students" in Ontario.

Power of big oil companies explored

by Gerry Lewarne

"Multinational oil companies have the potential to severely affect the whole of the world's economy," said Mark Wendorf on Tuesday night at a Student Christian Movement meeting.

To illustrate how large multinational oil companies are, one person at the meeting said it is a documented fact that "two cents of every dollar which changes hands every day in Canada goes to Imperial Oil."

Mr. Wendorf built his strong case by showing four methods that are used by the big oil companies to control the world economy. First, there is vertical integration. The "Seven Sisters", Exxon, Shell, Mobil, Texaco, Gulf, Standard Oil, and BP, "control over 50 percent of production, transportation, refining, and marketing of the world's oil. This gives them tremendous advantages because they can dodge taxes by giving tanker companies (registered in tax havens such as Liberia and Panama) huge profits on which they pay low taxes and low profits to refineries (located in the U.S. and Canada) which pay high profits.

Secondly, the use of joint ventures by the largest companies effectively cuts out competition. The big companies do not allow their smaller competitors into the consortia and "this is a form of collusion," said Wendorf.

A third method used by the largest companies is interlock of directors. "The directors of oil companies also sit on other companies' boards", he said. Also, "the top 20 oil companies in the U.S. have 131 interlocks with the top eight banks."

Finally, large oil companies use horizontal integration to further expand. "This is often called diversification and it means that the oil companies are into areas other than oil," Wendorf said. He further stated that "Exxon, through its various subsidiaries, are involved in oil, coal, solar power, uranium exploration, oil shales, consumer merchandising, chemicals, and construction."

These four methods allow the "Seven Sisters" to accumulate massive revenues. "If Exxon were a nation, it would have the sixth largest GNP in the world."

Asian students present China week at Queen's

by Rick Trites

Political posters represent an essential forum for communication in China's agrarian society, and symbolize the communal work values associated with the agricultural development program being pursued by the Chinese Communist Party.

Sunday evening saw a presentation sponsored by the Queen's Chinese Club, which included a showing of revolutionary posters, the performance of a China Club choral group and a martial arts demonstration. The Chinese students escorted small groups around explaining the revolutionary significance of the posters and relating their own experiences of their country.

Portraits of Lenin, Engels, and Stalin were strategically placed over the fireplace in the Victoria Common Room. The far wall was composed mainly of 'Mao and the people' posters depicting various images of Mao's legendary 'closeness to the people.' One poster, "the Revolutionary Grandmother," represented the continuing revolution and the important role and commitment of old and young alike.

A series of five posters described the 'growth' of Lei-Feng, a famous revolutionary hero, from a confrontation with a landlord in his youth, through his participation in the People's Liberation Army and work on a construction project despite serious illness, to helping a lost woman find her husband, Lei represents the ideal of the Chinese revolutionary selfless conduct.

Several posters showed hard labour (particularly in the steel industry) and these appeared to be from the 'Great Leap Forward' period of 1957. Again the theme was revolutionary: surpassing production quotas to benefit the people. A number of the posters were purely practical in nature, one on preserving potatoes; one on eye exercises for children; the majority however, dealt with revolutionary themes.

Chinese students take over Mac-Correy's student street this week

Talking with three Chinese students I found that, although they conceded the stylized and propagandist content of the posters, there was a quiet confidence and enthusiasm about the Maoist values presented in them, supported by the overwhelming popularity of the posters among the Chinese population.

"China Night" at Queen's was the opening event of a China Week in Canada, a series of educational events sponsored by Asian exchange students to promote a better understanding of the People's Republic.

Int'n'l Centre supports convicts study group

by Ross Bartlett

Inmates at Kingston's Prison for Women are attempting to broaden their horizons through a series of cross cultural experiences. In a set of programmes organized by the Queen's University International Centre convicts are learning about many countries in the world.

The program, now in the last half of its second year of operating is described by Chief Classification Officer Rowe as "a resounding success" and "a mutually learning experience." He claims that "the visitors to the penitentiary both give and receive benefits."

The group of inmates calls itself the International Culture group. The women, mainly in prison on charges relating to the importation of soft drugs, initiated the entire program. They contacted the International Centre and the Centre organized a program for them every Wednesday night.

Kaspar Pold, director of the International Centre describes the women as "not one's stereotype of a criminal" and as having "a wide variety of interests." Because "these interests are not run-of-the-mill...they find little in the prison to stimulate their minds." The cross-cultural program is an attempt to fill that gap.

Pold and his volunteer group of four or five men and women prepare a program they feel will be of interest to the inmates. In the past these programs have consisted of films, slides, speakers and musical entertainment. Occasionally the convicts will structure their own evenings and the visitors will be invited to "sports nights, social nights, or craft nights."

The program is "oriented around a presentation on an intellectual level." This is however, only one half of the benefits of the program. Both Rowe and Pold stressed what the latter called "the important socialization between visitor and convict which the inmates will need when they re-enter society."

Wayne Myles, one of the group that goes into the prison, called the evenings a "sharing of insights." According to Myles a wide variety of experiences have been offered. These include speakers who have visited or spent a period of time in "areas like Latin America, Jamaica, Japan, Indian and European countries." The group's insight is aided by the fact that "from 80-90 percent of the convicts are non-Canadians," thereby expanding the focus.

Some of the Queen's community members to speak to the group have been Dr. D. Pratt of McArthur College who showed slides of the assassination of President Kennedy and may return later this term to talk on the death of Martin Luther King, Dean of Women, E. Reid, on Red China and Dr. David McLay of the Department of Physics on the clothes and culture of the Arabs of North Africa.

Rowe insists on the success that the group has had. He claims that the visitors "have been a great asset to the group" and have become "one of the group, with no inhibitions or shyness."

Prof from Melbourne discusses government conflict

Lecturer speaks on Australian federalism

Annette Nicholson

Since 1972 Australia has seen "years of turmoil" arising out of a struggle for control of mineral and energy policy-making, according to Dr. Michael Crommelin, a Senior lecturer in law at the University of Melbourne. He was visiting Queen's on Tuesday as a guest of the Centre for Resource Studies. In Australia, as in Canada, the control of mineral and energy resources is a source of debate between 3 actors: the federal government, the provincial government and the mining industry.

In Australia, explained Crommelin, the two levels of government have concurrent, nor exclusive powers. The states have "undefined residual powers". Although no specific powers apply to mining, the federal powers, which can be used to control mining, include trade and commerce, taxation, defence and control of corporations, he continued.

The problem of ownership is complicated by 3 distinctions:

minerals in the states are state-owned, in the territories are federally owned, as are the minerals of the offshore regions, explained Crommelin.

Before December 1972 the states effectively controlled mineral exploration, development, production and marketing, he said, but the election of December 1972 brought the Australian Labour Party (ALP) to power after 23 years of Liberal government. The ALP has advocated the unification of Australia and the dismantling of the federal system. With their attempt to gain control of mineral policy, the years of Labour government, 1972-75, were turbulent, said Crommelin.

He explained how the Labour government exerted control through Crown Corporations, such as the Pipeline Authority, which has a de facto monopoly of the transportation of natural gas, and through export controls and taxation.

Since most mining is for export, "in the event of conflict, the federal government will prevail", he said, despite state ownership and residual powers, because of the blanket prohibitions on exports of raw materials, except at the discretion of the Ministry of Trade and Commerce.

Crommelin outlined three areas in which there is likely to be further conflict: control of off-shore minerals, division of powers and particularly jurisdiction over taxation, and finally the states' right to administer an income tax.

MBA to study in Australia

Student wins fellowship

Queen's University student, Donald Price, has received a Rotary fellowship to study business and international trade at the Australia National University in Canberra during the 1977-78 academic year.

Mr Price, a second-year master of business administration student, is one of 800 students throughout the world to win a fellowship this year from the Rotary Foundation of Rotary International.

The award covers the full cost of his one-year study-tuition fees, books, living expenses and transportation. Born in Niagara Falls, Ontario, Mr Price earned a BSc in civil engineering at Queen's in 1974. When he completes his studies in Australia, he plans to return to Canada to work in the marketing field.

A foreign problem

The referendum next week on the issue of foreign student fees provides an opportunity for Queen's students to reconsider their position on the issue. Here we consider some of the facts and problems involved with the issue.

Figures available from Statistics Canada do not agree with those available to the Senate Committee on Academic Development or from people such as Kaspar Pold, director for the Queen's International Centre. Clearly, if one is to assess the propriety of the imposition of an unequal tuition for non-Canadians, one needs to know from which countries these students come. Statistics Canada figures show that in 1975 only 28 percent of foreign students in Canada came from developed nations like the United States, Australia and the U.K. Mr. Pold and the members of SCAD have information to show that the majority of foreign students come from developed countries.

It is important to know upon whom one can rely. We have received contradictory information from authoritative sources. If, in fact, the 32,000 foreign students in Canada are primarily from countries such as the U.S. and U.K., one can legitimately argue that unequal tuition for non-Canadians is justifiable. There is no reason why the student from a wealthy nation should not recognize a greater portion of the actual cost of his education. And if a poor American or European cannot receive sufficient financial support for his education at home, it is not up to the Ontario taxpayer to overcome this inadequacy.

If, however, the bulk of foreign students are impoverished students from impoverished lands, it would not be fair to impose the differential fees on all in order to penalize the rich.

We are given figures on the number of Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) sponsored students. These students number 1,700 in Canada, 500 of whom are in Ontario, and have been screened by the agency from the developing nations. CIDA sponsored students are exempt from the differential fees and may have received up to $6,000 to study in Canada.

An important question involves the administrative complexities involved of monitoring the differential fees. If these costs are to offset any additional revenues to be gained then what's the use of having this policy? Again we find problems of information as there are considerable difficulties with proving a Canadian citizenship.

Finally we come to the lack of any room for qualification of agreement or disagreement with the issue on the referendum. We agree that students from developing nations who are personally impoverished should have their education underwritten by Canada. This is perhaps the most valuable form of foreign aid we can provide. How, though, does one express one's disagreement with the subsidization of students from wealthy countries?

For the Queen's student who does not want to subsidize foreign students from developed countries, a better question to ask would be: "Should students from underdeveloped countries be exempted from differential foreign student tuition fees?"

A better use of money

Although we're glad to see the AMS Constables and Pub staff deciding to make a concerted effort to clamp down on the theft of glasses and mugs from the Pub, it's a pity that such action was even necessary. Since October 15th last year, 1025 mugs have been carted away by patrons at a cost of nearly $1000 to the Pub and, therefore, the students.

One of the greatest attractions of the Queen's Pub is the appreciably lower prices charged there than other Kingston taverns. The Pub isn't grossing the profits it could if prices were inflated as they are elsewhere in town. The profits that are earned are presently helping to pay for the John Deutsch University Centre and to underwrite student services which can't financially support themselves.

We hope that the constables can put an end to the poaching of glassware. Not only could the $1000 required to replace the mugs help in other areas but the habit of being frisked when leaving the Pub is one students might prefer to live without.

Politics of acclamation concern reader

Dear Editor:

Based on the policy statements put forth by the new executive in the past two Journals, I can only conclude that Christie et al do not have any concrete policies or goals. The only other conclusion is the new executive does not wish to take any positions, in order that they can change policies if mass opposition is encountered. Mr. Christie is correct in saying that elections force policies to become rigid, but only to the extent that candidates specifically define their positions on the issues and the goals they would like to accomplish. In short, elections offer the voter an opportunity to evaluate all candidates, to determine what the candidates stand for and where their commitments lie, in order that the next executive may represent the positions which the majority of voters consider most beneficial to the university.

Unfortunately, this year's acclamation has deprived the voter of this right and opportunity, but the students still retain the right to know the SPECIFIC policies of the executive. Mr. Howe feels that students should feel free to come to the AMS office and ask what is happening, thus enabling the executive to make the issues known. I ask you Mr. Howe, how many students will make the effort to see any of the executive and how many students are you able to reach on such an individualist basis? I agree entirely with such an open door policy but I also feel the onus is not on the student to seek out the executive. Rather, it is the executive who must take the issues and their policies to the student. The importance of this responsibility has greatly increased with your acclamation.

I am interested in knowing what the new executive hopes to accomplish but I do not wish to hear of your policies within the confines of the AMS office. Instead, I request that the executive inform me of their positions on the issues through this paper.

Mr. Christie, Mr. Howe and Miss Button, I wish you the best for a successful administration in the upcoming year, but I would appreciate knowing on what basis I am wishing you this success.

Operations means more than just the pub.

Notes on Operations

by Gord Howe

THE QUEEN'S JOURNAL has asked each member of the new AMS executive to outline their view on the issues they will deal with next year. This second article deals with the role of AMS Vice-President (Operations).

The new Executive must be concerned with the level of student participation in extra-curricular activities, particularly after our acclamation and the anticipated rash of acclamations in Society elections. We have little desire to greatly extend the range of services offered by the A.M.S., other than (hopefully) the opening of the McLaughlin Room, without further consolidation and study of present services as any such extension would make the organization too large and complex to be efficiently run by students. But there are other means of encouraging participation. One key area, as has been mentioned previously, is the funding of clubs. We feel that the level of this funding, although raised significantly last year, is still inadequate and must be raised significantly higher. It is hoped that, with more funds available, more students will be able to develop extra-curricular interests and skills.

But it has been settled for next year and Paul Steep has won a valuable concession from the P.U.C. - the application of the principle of volume discount in the calculation of the price of the contract. However, certain problems still exist with this service. The university has stated that it probably will not increase its present contribution to the program, due to the financial restraints being placed upon it. Also, the costs of running this service will not decrease in the future but can only increase. Students will therefore have to pay the entire amount of any increase in costs that will result in the future, increases that will be reflected in an already high student interest fee of $98,000 is a large sum to pay for a service that relatively few students use, although some students depend on Bus-it to get to campus. Therefore I intend to study 1) the effect of Bus-it on the student housing market, 2) the willingness of the students to support such a program with an-anticipated higher costs, 3) in conjunction with the university, the feasibility of alternative means of transportation for students who would be placed in severe difficulty if the service were to be abandoned. We cannot give up Bus-it without providing another service in its place, the university must retain partial responsibility for providing transportation to students living away from campus, and, if a cheaper and feasible alternative can be provided, it should be provided.

Student housing is another issue of concern to this Executive. As Jodi Butten pointed out in the last issue of the Journal, we will attempt to resurrect the Queen's Tenant Association to help students in transactions with their landlords. But the A.M.S. also leases houses to students, houses which are owned by the university. Although the students pay their rent to the A.M.S., the repairs are carried out through the Housing and Property Management office of the university; consequently there is some difficulty in insuring that the needed repairs are carried out. I intend to enter into negotiations with the university to transfer responsibility for repairs to the A.M.S. in order to facilitate the maintenance of these buildings, which sometimes has been lacking in the past.

Services have been well run by the present Inner Council and we hope to continue this record.

Bad wording

Dear Editor: This is in regard to the list of referendum questions printed in Tuesday's Journal. It is our opinion that the fourth statement, regarding foreign student tuition, should be written in the affirmative, as were the first three. The wording of the last is ambiguous, and a student may not truly understand which way he is casting his vote, causing inaccuracies in the tabulated results.

Hopefully, this can be amended before the referendum date.

Nursing Viewpoint

On the B.N.Sc. trail

This is the first of a series of six articles written to inform you about the Queen's Nursing course and its activities. There is a great need for this, as illustrated by the ever-common question, "What's the difference between the two-year and four-year program?" In subsequent articles, we plan to outline the course at Queen's. The four year program goes into great depth in most areas; i.e. Queen's nursing students actively do home visits to families in the community and are involved with clinics, nursery schools and even dentists' offices.

Nursing experience is gained by clinical and classroom hours. When the Queen's nursing student graduates, she has a degree in the science of nursing and qualifies to write her registered nursing exams. After obtaining a B.N.Sc., she has a choice of many fields to enter, for example—a clinical area in the hospitals, teaching, administration (after practical experience), or public health.

The Nursing Science Society is run by an executive formed from nursing students. Elections are held each year at the same time as AMS elections. Our activities include smokers; health teaching in the community; we donate money to societies such as Camp Outlook and United Way. We are a member of the Canadian University National Students Organization (CUNSA). CUNSA has a national conference each year. This year, it will be held in Calgary and four Queen's nursing students will attend. The year closes with the Nursing Formal, which is usually held at the 401 Inn. These are only some of our many activities.

In subsequent articles, each year will write, telling you about their courses and clinical experience. It is our hope, that you may gain a better understanding of Nursing at Queen's and what it's all about.

NUS: supporters . . .

Dear Editor:

It is encouraging to witness the Alma Mater Society's enthusiasm for joining the National Union of Students (NUS). The Queen's Journal and other campus media have carried articles and opinion pieces extolling students to vote "yes" on the referendum next week, and these votes of confidence are certainly an important element of any successful campaign.

The real test, however, will be on Wednesday and Thursday when the students at large vote. I hope that all of you will vote, and like your student representatives on Outer Council, I hope that you vote "yes". The reasons for committing your one dollar to the National Union of Students have been well aired—the issues at stake are real and pressing.

. . . include ASUS

Dear Editor:

This coming week's referendum will carry the following question: "Should the AMS become a member of the National Union of Students at a cost per student of $1.00 to be added to the student interest fee?"

Recognizing the benefit of joining a student organization such as the NUS, the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society Executive pledges their support for the National Union of Students. We urge all Arts and Science students to carefully consider the issue and to read the various pamphlets, articles, and letters regarding NUS. With sufficient knowledge of what the National Union of Students can do for Queen's students, we are confident that the students at Queen's will vote "yes" to the NUS question.

On behalf of the ASUS Executive, Bob White
President
Arts and Science Undergraduate Society

If you have reservations, come to the A.M.S. Office and ask questions. Or, speak to one of the students handing out literature about NUS. After all, the most important job of NUS is listening to students.

Dissenter

Dear Editor:

Some ideas are ahead of their time. Some ideas are ideas whose time has come. And some ideas are purely and simply stupid. One such stupid idea is NUS.

Had there ever been a good reason for the existence of NUS (a dubious proposition) it is certainly gone now. I suggest there is a meaning behind the "widespread disinterest and disorganization on many campuses" observed by Mr. Avis in his article, "NUS Evaluated".

The sad fact of the matter is that today there are neither burning issues nor burning passions. Most students, indeed, most Canadians, are pretty much satisfied with the status quo. We are not the stuff of revolution. Even the imminent dismemberment of Canada by the secession of Quebec illicitly, at most, a mild, eye-bating disbelief. Where in such a scheme of things is there room for NUS?

NUS will be an artificial organization whose forces will be drained by its efforts to create the very "grass-roots enthusiasm" that is itself the creator and sustainer of organizations such as NUS. In its short and miserable life, NUS will be like an obsessed dentist scouring a toothless maw for one more tooth to pull.

Nobody needs NUS

A case of mid-winter madness

"The first reconsideration thereof, and a recounting of the famous history of Malcolm Milktoast; and of his many adventures too numerous to be listed with regard to brevity, the sole virtue of good prose".

January seems to be a low point in the school year for many students. It is a cold and cruel month when the leaf-green heart of blossom and bole lies still beneath the frozen breast of Mother Nature (Actually it serves her right. Mother Nature was warned against the consequences of silicone treatments).

It marks the beginning of another term, but not a fresh beginning. Unfavourable exam results often provide a rigid framework from which the student must develop a perspective on the rest of the year. One student I know never pays the second instalment on his tuition until all his exam results are in. His name is Malcolm Milktoast and he is in third year political science.

"After all," claimed Malcolm, "that second instalment is the equivalent of a plane ticket out of this place." A healthy cynic sitting nearby expressed his conviction that Malcolm would probably not leave Queen's even if he got 12 percent in all five courses. Twelve percent was a little closer to the truth than Malcolm cared to mention and he quickly shifted his eyes about the room, mumbling nervously about vans, Florida, and water beds. Most people remained unconvinced.

All this was taking place, by the way, in Malcolm's politics seminar, "The tragiccestasy of Karl Marx." The course is very popular this year because the textbook, "The Evils of Capitalist Exploitation", is available at such a low price. This was made possible through the efforts of K-Tel Inc., who were marketing the edition on an ambitious scale. (24 original hits, 24 original thinkers).

On Malcolm's left sat Dietrich Danger, one of the older students. After leaving the NHL Dietrich had served as a mercenary in Viet Nam and later in Angola. Ten years later, life held no meaning for Dietrich. Needing new horizons and challenges, Dietrich returned to Queen's to finish his B.A.

"How goes the battle, Dietrich?" asked Malcolm.

On Malcolm's right sat the beautiful and dangerous Natasha, who had received Malcolm's exam results by courier.

"How long have we been going out, Malcolm?" she asked.

"Twenty-four hours" he replied. "It's over Malcolm. I never go out for more than a day because I want to avoid falling into a pattern".

Malcolm wanted to point out that what she had just described was, in itself, a pattern. But alas, this was the last straw and Malcolm was suddenly mortified. The January blues were officially open.

Now most of us cope with this syndrome with tea and sympathy. Personally, I knit mailbags and make licence plates. But at the time of his misfortune, Malcolm happened to be reading "The Famous History of Don Quixote de La Mancha" and soon translated his woe into the glorious realization that his destiny was to liberate the academic captives. In other words, he was feeling the strain.

Across from Malcolm sat a stunningly beautiful girl who was delivering a seminar. The purpose of the seminar was to determine whether or not Marxist theory is more boring than chartered accountancy. Malcolm arose, halted the class, and demanded that the course be cancelled.

"I'm sorry but you're weird," said the girl.

Malcolm ignored her greeting and addressed her and the class in the following way.

"Madam, I perceive that your state of bondage affords you little pleasure. We are, all of us, preparing seminars and affixing our seal and the thread of time to sundry loose leaf very reluctantly, perhaps, without knowing it, against our wills. Perhaps it is OSAP in one, a scholarship in another, or the overwhelming generosity of parents in still another which have delivered us up to our academic undoing. But be of good cheer, my destiny is clear and I exhort this gentle professor to release Her Majesty's students forthwith lest by the Grace of God and the valour of my right arm he is forced to do so under compulsion."

During the commotion the professor was notified that all classes were cancelled due to the snowstorm. And so, after rebuking the chivalrous Malcolm, he dismissed the class.

"Your insolence is mingled with a fine brand of foolishness," said Malcolm, "Nevertheless I will give

Arts Festival organizers say their thank-yous

Dear Editor:

To all those people who participated in, and helped organize Arts Festival '77, many thanks. Special thanks should go to Peter Stocheff, Becky Reuler, Manlee Jones, Paul Adams, Anne West, Kathryn Hartel, Susie Wright, Philip Beesly, Terry Hall, Liz Klink, Reed Hart, Joanne Gould, Sandy Aiken, Nancy Brennan, Shawn Cornet, and Kathy Vernon.

We also appreciated help from the administration through Barry Cole, Norman Hart, Peter Stokes and most of all, Moe Chocla.

Hopefully we can get a dinner arranged for those students who assisted us.

your leave to wallow in cowardice, knowing full well it is I who have secured the liberty of these students and have established justice in the land, not some snowstorm, inanimate and unavailing of reason."

This triumph gave Malcolm the lift he needed to start another term, certain that moral victories would lead to academic ones. It would be nice if all of us were blessed with this

Greer: impressive in her frankness

Dr. Germaine Greer spoke to a packed house in Grant Hall on Tuesday Feb. 1. Her lecture was entitled "Feminism and Fertility".

This observer was highly impressed with both the content and delivery of Ms. Greer's address. Despite jet lag and a severe change of climate, she gave her audience a lively and provocative presentation. Frankness and intelligence are her chief characteristics; her lecture was consistent with the high quality she has displayed throughout her life.

Someone (a woman) remarked to me after the lecture that Ms. Greer's remarks were addressed specifically to women, and that a number of men who attended were put off by this. She also referred to Germaine Greer's statement that "I don't much care for the feelings of men anymore." It is a gross error to think that Ms. Greer's message does not have significance for men as well as women. Her beliefs and observations are reasonable and critically relevant for the health and happiness of all adults. Although she specifically addresses women, her subject is really sexual interaction between men and women.

Ms. Greer is an intelligent and dynamic speaker, whose insight was appreciated by most of those attending her lecture. Thank you, Germaine Greer.

Just what did Germaine Greer say? Most generally, she wants women (and men) to reevaluate their priorities regarding sexual activity. She wants people in our society to be conscious of how we may abuse our bodies, our minds, and our relationships by having sexual activities which we may not have fully thought out.

Ms. Greer claims that Australian, British, and North American women - and equally their men - suffer from a "genital obsession", and that we have confused "sexual intercourse" with coitus. She advocates that we explore the entire range of opportunities available for sexual gratification and orgasm, rather than rely, as we do, on "intro-mission". She believes that we are lazy about sexuality, and that we cannot make up a lack of quality with quantity. Such laziness is degrading and creates undue tension in both men and women.

Germaine Greer has fought for many years for the sexual liberation

Education under fire

by Bob Bijou (reprinted from the Charlton)

Over the past few years, our educational system has come under severe attack from all directions. And I must say that I agree, with a system which produces, after 13 years, a large percentage of students who are not competent to read or write in their native language. And there is something wrong with a system which frequently has classes of over 100 and must use lecture halls and theatres to accommodate students. And there is something wrong with a system which produces hundreds of people who are qualified for jobs which do not exist. But it's easy to criticize education, to point out its short-comings, and to cast it in a bad light. It's time to start exploring what can be done to make it better. I'd like to suggest we begin by looking at the other side of the coin, at situations where education is successfully creating meaningful and satisfying experiences.

Jon Shearer is one of Ottawa's great teachers. These days he can be found teaching at Algonquin, St. Pat's, The $25 University, and anywhere else they let him. He loves what he's teaching, presents it beautifully and is blessed with a smile that people just can't resist. Very quickly he makes you realize that good education involves the knowledge, the thoughts, the ideas, the feelings, the experiences, and the humour of everyone present. Good education goes way beyond reading, writing, and arithmetic. Way beyond.

I am currently taking a course with Jon on Dreams. One of the many intriguing ideas he has presented is hypnagogic suggestion, the idea that thoughts experienced just prior to falling asleep frequently influence the contents of dreams. Experiments with films, music and a variety of sensory inputs have demonstrated this phenomenon in the lab; personal accounts, including Jon's own, support this in "real life" situations.

Our project for the week was to pick a face in the class and try to program that person into our dreams through hypnagogic suggestion. Just lie in bed in our favorite falling-asleep position and visualize the face. Perhaps that person will show up in a dream.

What more lovable and friendly face to choose than Jon's, I said silently to myself. So last night, I drifted off to sleep thinking about Jon and replaying some of my mental video-tapes. Watching him talk, watching him walk across the room, watching him gracefully toss his hair back over his shoulder, watching him listen to someone and then say "Excellent!"

I awoke this morning and wrote down last night's dreams in my journal. Sure enough, Jon was in one of my dream scenes: "Jon and I were in the community centre where the class takes place. We wanted a certain drawing done and I was saying I could do it using three magic markers: a black one, a red one with a wide nib, and a red one with a thin nib. He was saying I couldn't, that people would be able to see the difference between the two reds and it would look crappy. A large amount of energy welled up between us in disagreement, although we weren't really arguing; we're both too polite and neither of us are the lighting type."

So far I've had two classes with Jon. I've been influenced by the ideas of cultures I never knew existed, I've heard about creatively-done scientific experiments which help me understand some rather fuzzy phenomena, I've developed some new ways of thinking about and experiencing what is going on inside of me, and I've had the opportunity to share Jon's experiences as well as those of other members of the class.

Now that's education.

QWC: 'A laugh at labour'

Dear Editor:

We would like to apologize to anyone who might have been offended by the last film run on Tuesday, January 25 in the Mac-Corry lunch area. The film was a mistake and not part of the film series, Women in Careers. Due to lack of time and money we were unable to prescreen some of the films we had not seen. In retrospect, we had a good laugh and hope everyone else did.

The Journal ran a feature article on the Queen's Women's Centre, Friday, January 21, at which is stated that Flora MacDonald would be speaking in our discussion panel on January 27. This was also a mistake. Due to weather conditions the seminar was cancelled but has been rescheduled for Monday, March 7, at 7.30 in the Ban Righ Common Room. Speakers will be Ms. Lynne Kennedy, a counsellor from Career Planning and Placement, Dr. Sandy Cowan, a general practitioner in the Kingston area, Ms. Audrey Rushbrook, an engineer working for Alcan, and Ms. Kay Herman, a Sociology professor at Queen's.

PUC recognized economic realities

by Jamie Avis, A.M.S. President

In next week's referendum, students will be asked to approve an increase in the student fee for BUS-IT from $5.35 to $5.85. I think this is a good bargain, and I recommend that students continue to support BUS-IT on these terms.

The figure of $5.85 was arrived at in the following way PUC estimates that there will be over 362,970 rides taken by students next year. In accordance with a sliding scale which is based on the principle of volume discount, the A.M.S. pays the full adult single fare of 30c on the first 100,000 rides, 27c on the next 100,000, 25c on the next 100,000, and 24c on the remaining 62,970. This adds up to $97,100 and includes service from the middle of September until the end of April. In addition, the A.M.S. charters buses to run between Main and West campuses from 11 p.m. to 1 a.m. This additional service costs about $5,000, bringing the total amount to $102,100. By eliminating service between Christmas and New Year's, and in the last two weeks in April, and by paying the student portion of the contract price in a lump sum in October, the cost is reduced to $98,500.

Of this amount, the university is willing to pay $38,964, leaving a balance of $59,536 to be raised through the student interest fee. It is estimated that there will be 10,200 fee-paying students next year. Thus the cost per student is $5.84, which is rounded up to the nearest 5c, to give $5.85.

Any way you look at these figures, they spell out that both the PUC and the university have made important concessions in order that BUS-IT may continue.

In the past Queen's met 40 percent of the contract price. Last year, due to financial constraint and the rapidly escalating cost of BUS-IT, the Principal made it clear that Queen's could no longer remain locked into an open-ended 40 percent commitment. Thus we had not expected the university to increase its contribution beyond $35,500, which was last year's figure. We were, therefore, pleased when the university agreed to raise its contribution by 7.6 percent which reflects the increase in its operating revenues. This increase meant a contribution of $3.82 per student, or $38,964. Interestingly, this amount is almost 40 percent of the total price.

There can be no doubt that the willingness of the university to continue its commitment to BUS-IT at the same level as in the past depended upon important concessions made by the PUC. Both the AMS and the university agreed that the original PUC offer of about $114,000 was unacceptable. This figure represented a 32 percent increase over last year's price, and a tripling of the original price for BUS-IT. We felt we had to draw the line somewhere. We also were convinced that the PUC reaps substantial benefits from BUS-IT and that it would be anxious to save the program if possible in view of its own deficit position.

Our main objection to the method which had been used in the past for computing BUS-IT prices was that no recognition was given to the guaranteed nature of the contract nor to the thousands of additional rides taken by students that would not be taken if BUS-IT wasn't available. Up until this year, every projected ride cost the full adult single fare. In departing from this principle, the PUC recognized economic realities. This was the only way BUS-IT could have been saved.

A few more figures will indicate that this contract represents a good bargain and a fair one. The adult fare went from 25c to 30c last year - an increase of 20 percent. The cost of BUS-IT increased by only 9.65 percent - from $9,000 to $9,850. Moreover, the individual student faces an increase of only 50c or 9.35 percent. These figures are very reasonable, particularly when the PUC has evidence of a significant increase in student use of buses.

Hopefully, the benefits of BUS-IT are appreciated by all students. They have been well presented in several recent submissions to the Journal. The importance of a transportation link with West Campus, the need to relieve pressure on housing near the university, the need to provide transportation to those students forced to live outside walking distance of the university and the importance of encouraging contact between students and the Kingston community, are among the foremost reasons for supporting BUS-IT.

A lot of work has gone into preparing a fair yet affordable package, and a lot of concessions have been made. I hope you, the students, will vote to continue BUS-IT.

Women lobby for social change

by Mary Mitchell

A new political lobbying group has been formed across the country, comprised entirely of women and distinguished by its feminist orientation.

In 1974, a conference on "Women and the Law" in Windsor resulted in a decision among the participants to form a national association of women. Thus in 1975, in Winnipeg, a founding convention brought about The National Association of Women and the Law (L'Association Nationale de la Femme et le Droit). The 1976 convention in Ottawa established a constitution, bylaws and a communications network to inform women across the country of its existence.

The purpose of this organization is to examine existing legislation, condemn sexual discrimination, propose legal changes and work toward implementing these proposals by familiarizing the public with sexual inequalities in the law. While most of its founding members were women law students, the membership from the beginning has been open to all women who support the objectives of the organization.

This past weekend on January 28, 29 and 30th, a second national conference was held to determine policy objectives and the means of implementing them. The opening address was given by Jill Vickers, Associate Professor of Political Science at Carleton University and President of the Canadian Association of University Teachers. Speaking about the different types of feminist groups (the Liberal Reformers, Socialist Women and the Radical Reformers), Ms. Vickers stressed the peculiar problems that women's organizations to date have faced, which inevitably retard their effectiveness. In their overall objective of unifying all women to one goal, they encounter internal conflicts due to regional, ethnic, linguistic, and sometimes class differences. Frequently the conflict is not just due to differing policy objectives, but because of the most fundamental questions of how to do business as an organization. Ms. Vickers describes the most effective pressure groups operating in the Canadian political context as "highly structured, with definable leaders permitted a high degree of executive and decision making power which can mobilize and manipulate its membership quickly and easily and which can provide sufficient psychic value to its members to make them willing to pay high dues."

The fundamental problem then, Ms. Vickers maintains, is how we can "honour values of equality among women without rendering feminist organizations impotent as instruments for social change."

In its political perspective NAWL is essentially moderate or small, 'I Liberal

In an interview with Peggy Mason, one of NAWL's founding members, presently an articling student and a candidate for the National Steering Committee, Ms. Mason echoed many of the sentiments voiced by Prof. Vickers. While the main body of its membership is women law students, NAWL derives a good deal of participation and support from interested non-legal community women across the country. The strength of the organization, Ms. Mason maintains, is based primarily on this fusion of professional-legal-grass roots commitment. In its political perspective, NAWL is essentially moderate or "small 'I Liberal."

NAWL has also attempted to provoke media attention by directing the main focus of their convention around a current controversial subject. At the Winnipeg conference of 1975, the main topic discussed was the proposed reforms in Family Law. In 1976 it was concerned with women in the Labour Force. This last conference dealt with the proposed Bill C-25, The Canadian Human Rights Act.

One of NAWL's primary functions, Ms. Mason declares, is an educative one. Its legal members plan to translate the legal jargon of existing and proposed legislation to make it comprehensible and therefore open to criticism by the lay person.

In discussing the floundering state of women's centres across the country, Ms. Mason pointed out that their lack of political focus and inherent negativism have been instrumental in inhibiting their progress. Women are not used to working in groups, nor are they used to thinking politically. "How are you going to change things from outside the system?", she said. Peggy Mason's own experience in NAWL has provided her with just this experience of working in groups and in learning "how to build an organization and use it as a tool."

"You could drive a truck through" the loopholes in Bill C-25

The conference was made memorable by the brief appearance of Maureen McTeer, wife of the Leader of the opposition, Joe Clark. Ms. McTeer came to lead one of the afternoon workshops. On Saturday evening, the minister of Justice, Ron Basford presented a speech on the proposed Bill C-25. Maintaining that there has been a "legal revolution in the status of women", Basford assured the convention that last year's amendments to the rape laws were only "interim amendments". The most significant change in the status of women to date, he claims, will be brought about by Bill C-25. While most of the women present objected to the Bill on the basis of its obvious loopholes ("that you could drive a truck through" as one woman remarked), Basford attempted to persuade them that altogether it was better than no Bill at all.

From this writer's observations, the business of the meetings was slowed down considerably by procedural wrangles on the floor of the convention. Yet the assembly did manage to produce a high degree of consensus on the many resolutions and by-laws that were passed. A distinguishing feature was the high strong atmosphere of optimism, encouragement and support seen among the members and participants. Its present problems are obviously those of a fledgling organization. Yet the NAWL/ANFD could definitely prove to be a formidable pressure group for the federal and provincial governments to contend with.

What would we do without...

The Grounds - home for folk and much more

by Eric Hughes

Since the mid-sixties, Queen's has been blessed with a place that folk music has been able to call its campus home. Bitter Grounds fills this unique and necessary position, giving students a chance to see quality folk music at reasonable prices.

Run by the Engineering Society, Bitter Grounds is operated on a strictly non-profit basis (even the waitresses are volunteers) by a committee of approximately ten people who are responsible for everything, i.e., financial, physical (sound system and stage maintenance etc.), and personnel (booking of performers) etc.

There are two distinct positions of responsibility on this committee: that of manager and that of treasurer. In the make-up of this group, one of the two members must be an engineer in order to assure a direct link with the Engineering Society, (although this year, the treasurer, an engineer, has had to drop out of the position. This posed no serious problem to the rest of the committee who, by the group's co-operative set-up, have been able to assume the various responsibilities the position formerly entailed.)

Manager Craig Pincher stresses the fact that he does not "rule with an iron hand", although the buck does stop at him. Ultimately, he must take the responsibility for the decisions he and his council make. In the past, managers have instituted such things as the coffee-house's move to Clark Hall, the compulsory membership for admission to the Grounds of previous years, even the decision to close the Grounds in the '73-'74 school year. It was through this closing that the importance of Bitter Grounds to the university's life became apparent, and the Grounds returned with a vengeance.

Since that dark season, Bitter Grounds has featured a good many high-quality performers. When one considers that such people as Colleen Peterson, Douglas MacArthur, Bruce Coburn and Fraser and de Bolt performed here in the early days for as little as $10-$15, it is not surprising to see them returning (It might be noted here that the average salary for a Grounds performer is now $200 per night).

Pincher also points out that the Grounds owes a lot to the help of the Engineering Society. Much of the refurbishing of Clark Hall this past summer was done with Bitter Grounds in mind. These have included improvements to the lighting and sound systems and to the stage itself. More improvements are in store as the Grounds made a $180 profit last year, and all money made by the Grounds is put back into the Grounds.

Bitter Grounds is located in the Jackson Lounge (alias the Clark Hall Pub), on top of the bookstore. The main entrance is on the south side of the bookstore building (the side facing Carruthers Hall). Bitter Grounds will run every Saturday night (except Feb. 19 and 26 - reading week), and approximately every other Friday night as well. Admission is $2.25 if you are a member of the Grounds, (memberships are now optional for admission and are sold for $1.00 at the door), and $2.75 for non-members).

A man of many hats...

Smith at the Grounds

Actor-songwriter-humorist Cedric Smith will be appearing at Bitter Grounds this Saturday, February 5. Smith has performed in numerous schools, coffeehouses and theatres throughout Canada with enthusiastic response.

His acting experience includes seasons with the Stratford Festival, Manitoba Theatre Centre, the Yeats Theatre Company in London, England as an actor-director-composer, the Toronto Workshop Productions where he appeared as Che Guevara, featured at the 1969 Venice Festival.

Smith was a founding member of the Perth County Conspiracy, and could claim title of its spokesman if he wanted it. He was there in Stratford in 1961 when the Black Swan coffeehouse began. It was he along with Richard Keelan, who created the folk duo there that took on the name Perth County Conspiracy - and around which most of the notoriety revolved. During the group's heyday in the 1971-72 era, there were anywhere from 25 to 100 conspirators in six or seven Stratford area farms.

Musical composer and co-adaptor for the highly successful stage adaptation of Barry Broadfoot's depression chronicle Ten Lost Years, which has toured the country extensively and was featured as a CBC television special, Smith was nominated for an Actra award for the TV adaptation, and a Drama Critics award.

Urjo Kareda, formerly dramatic critic for the Toronto Star has said of Smith "Smith has expanded our notions of the lyric theatre in subtle and memorable ways - a haunting kind of musical theatre, funny, insinuating, touching."

Smith was a Canadian representative to the 1975 Festival of Political Song, hosted in East Berlin where an album was also recorded for release throughout the socialist countries and Canada.

During his act, Smith takes his audience on a musical tour of the world with songs of WWII, Ireland and Canada. He peppers his approach to the topics of his songs with hope and a lot of humour. That's Cedric Smith at Bitter Grounds this Saturday, February 5.

Bitter Grounds Schedule

Feb. 5 - Cedric Smith with Jane Johnson, Phil Beasley and Trevor as guest set.

Feb. 11-12 - John A. Cameron and Robbie MacNeill with guest Amy Mareiniss

Feb. 19 and 26 - the Grounds will be closed for reading week

Mar. 4-5 - Tom Akstens with guest set by Pan Cleaver

Mar. 12 - Watson and Reynolds with the 5 man Tom O'Brien band

Mar. 18-19 - Dixie Flyers

Mar. 26 - Student Night.

April 1-2 - the Grounds will be open, but the performers have not been booked.

As Pincher emphasizes, "We need the support of the audiences, especially for the well-known performers who cost a lot of money." Support is also needed for those performers who are not as well-known, but who very well may be some day. Also, Bitter Grounds is for the students and, "it's only going to be there as long as the students are going to support it!"

Elmer Iseler conducts the Toronto Mendelssohn Choir.

"Superb choral stylings"

Mendelssohn Choir

Since its inception in 1894, the Toronto Mendelssohn Choir's tradition of quality has been built over the years. Now in its 83rd season, the choir continues to set and maintain the highest standards of choral music anywhere.

Elmer Iseler became conductor in 1964. In 1968, the Festival Singers of Canada, a professional group of 32 voices founded by Dr. Iseler in 1955 became part of the Mendelssohn Choir, making it the first amateur-professional group in Canada.

In August 1972, the choir toured Europe presenting concerts in Ripon Cathedral, Harrogate, England, in St. Germain des Pres, Paris, France; in Lucerne, Switzerland, in Aldeburgh and in London, England.

The choir will be performing in Grand Hall on Saturday, February 5. Their program will include the "Jubilate Deo" by Britten, excerpts from Liszt's "Missa Choralis", two motets by Verdi, and pieces by Brahms, John Paynter and Schoenberg.

The choir's mastery of artistic technique makes possible performances of many works few choirs would attempt. The choir is now ranked among the finest in the world.

If you're looking for "something human"

"When I met them it was a revelation," says Floriana Frassetto of her two Mummenschanz co-members Andres Bossard and Bernie Schurch. "They were looking for something else just like I was. The classic mime is so involved with the perfection of beauty and aesthetics. The famous mimes hide themselves behind a divinity, they become very musical. I was looking for something human."

Mummenschanz wear masks and flexible body wrappings in their act. You never see the performers face. What they produce has been compared to Cubism and the paintings of Hieronymous Bosch. They make all their own masks, props and costumes. Their program focuses on human development from the single cell to the primates and on human communication. In one segment of the performance, two of the performers wear masks made up of 20 cubes and they "bamble" and play chess with portions of the mask. "You can also look at what we do as purely abstract shapes, but most people associate our movements with animal or human behavior," says Bossard. Mummenschanz is an effort to build on the Swiss folk traditions involving masks. There are masks for all kinds of things; to announce an event, to drive winter away. The people in the villages just do those ceremonies. They are not performers. They go home afterwards and no one knows who they are."

In 1973, Mummenschanz toured for the first time in North America and their reception was remarkable. They have played in London, Paris, Berlin and Edinburgh.

Mummenschanz will be appearing again in Kingston at the Grand Theatre on Wednesday February 9 at 8:30 p.m. Tickets may be purchased from the Performing Arts Box Office or at the door for $4, $5 (with a $1 discount for students).

Music from Marlboro

"An impressive repertoire of skills"

by Fenela Childs
On Wednesday, 26th of January, the Dunning Hall concert series presented Music from Marlboro, a chamber ensemble originating from the Marlboro summer festival in Vermont. Each year the festival, under the direction of Rudolf Serkin, sends out chamber groups of various instruments and sizes, formed for the first time at the festival itself. Although the members of the ensemble change each year, their high standards of performance do not, and the group which came here was no exception.

The ensemble was a string sextet, consisting of Felix Galimir, violin, Yuuko Shiohawa, violin, Kim Kashkashian, viola, Patricia McCarty, viola, Paul Tobias, cello, and Paul Cheifetz, cello. They performed four works from the nineteenth century-Schoenberg's Verklarte Nacht, two Pieces for String Quartet by Hugo Wolf, and Dvorak's String Sextet in A Major. All four pieces were presented with an excellence of technique and balance all the more impressive in a group so recently formed.

The programme began with Schoenberg's Verklarte Nacht, or Transfigured Night, a tone poem written in 1899. The composer's unusual treatment of the ninth chord in this work renders it extremely difficult to perform. However, there was no evidence of any faltering in Wednesday's performance. Each musician contributed equally and had the same chance at the lead-no one player appropriating all the limelight, as is so often the case. The various tones of the piece were very well portrayed, ranging from peacefulness to shock, sweetness to exuberance. The players exhibited an impressive repertoire of skills, playing at one moment with exquisite delicacy, and at the next, with incredible strength and speed.

From the Schoenberg, the ensemble moved on to two pieces for string quartet by Wolf, his Intermezzo, and the Italian Serenade. The first was a gay, liting piece, with a constant dialogue occurring between the instruments. Frequent crescendos and changes in tempo created a humorous effect which was much appreciated by the audience. Wolf's second work, the Serenade, was equally well-performed, with the perfect partnership of the two violins especially noteworthy.

The last, and longest work on the programme was Antonin Dvorak's String Sextet in A major, Opus 48. The repeated melody of the first movement and the fast and lively runs of the third were the highlights of the work. The musicians again revealed their clear tones and masterful bowing in this work, as they tossed the various themes around between them. The composition itself was surprisingly balanced and unified, in contrast with some of Dvorak's larger and less coherent orchestral works.

The concert as a whole was very well-received by the audience, whose generous applause was a tribute to the excellent technique, balance, and unified playing of the group. The fault, if any, of the evening lies not with the players, but with the format of the programme. To coin a phrase, at times it became too much of a "muchness". The works, all from the nineteenth century, were too similar in style and content to provide the necessary variety, one composer running into the next. The nature of the ensemble itself was also too much of the same thing-there is only so much variation possible with only three kinds of instruments, all strings. For this reviewer at least, such similarity in style and content gave the evening periods of monotony. However, this is merely a personal opinion; the generous applause of the audience for the unquestioned skill of the performers would seem to indicate that there were no reservations on the part of others.

At Chalmers . . . flutist Tompkins

Charms audience

Last Sunday the audience at Chalmers United Church was in for a real treat. In the first concert of a series designed to raise the funds for their new Steinway grand piano, flutist Craig Tompkins presented a highly ambitious and varied program, with the assistance of Eleanor Daley on piano and harpsichord, and a string ensemble of Priscilla Grant, Cory Fearn, and Cathy Krause.

Mr. Tompkins performs with confidence and ease, and the program exhibited his interest in traditional music as well as contemporary Canadian composition. The works, Quentin's Sonata in E Minor and Mozart's Quartet in D Major, K.285, performed with the string ensemble had good blend and balance. Some of the magic of the Mozart was lost however, due to the sameness of tone colour from the flute throughout.

Of the two Canadian pieces Talivaldis Kenins' "Concertante" and Norma Beecroft's "Tre Pezzi Brevi" both for flute and piano, the latter especially proved to be a splendid success. Precisely and sensitively performed the players showed a good grasp of their respective techniques of flutter-tonguing and harmonics, and interspersed hammered and plucked notes. Last November, they successfully aired this work at Toronto's Contemporary Showcase. Although musical expression pervaded the Concertante, admittedly difficult passages of high notes became rushed and tended to lack tonal focus.

Variations on "Nel Cor Plu" by nineteenth century inventor, flutist, and composer, Theobald Boehm, closed the concert. This work is a virtuoso show-piece and although there was the occasional technical problem, the music did sparkle. Kingston can look forward to hearing more from this young artist in the future.

For most radio stations, a continuous supply of new music is a sort of life-line that is used to develop and maintain an image. What tunes are chosen to be played molds the image onto the airwaves where keen listeners can readily identify it. Some stations are obviously different. Country music, heavy rock music, contemporary-MOR music, background music, and teeny bopper music are all available on this life-line where music directors are instructed to pick out those pieces that adequately represent the "personality" that management wants the radio station to have.

However, the most popular form of radio programming, namely Top 40, presents a different story. To begin with, there are various forms of Top 40. While most appeal to the younger listeners, a few stations deviate from this norm and play only the music directed towards university-aged people (whatever that is). Admittedly, there is overlapping, but tunes such as "Hot Line" by the Sylvers would usually be non-existent on the latter programs.

But the major problem of categorizing Top 40 into a type of musical format is that it doesn't really centre around one. It is generally quite easy to distinguish a station that plays only underground rock from one that plays easy-listening music. But Top 40 music includes both categories. As a result, one may listen to "Somebody to Love" (the latest single by Queen) one minute and "Nadia's Theme" or "Bless the Beasts and the Children" the next minute. While there was no question that "Disco Duck" would be a smash success before it plummeted to its demise (it fell off of most charts in less than four weeks), one may not expect to hear an easy-listening piece such as "Love Theme from 'A Star is Born'" soon after.

The fact is, this is what Top 40 is all about. These stations will play almost any single release that they believe is popular to the public. Admittedly, not all of us may agree that a particular piece should be one of the hot singles of the week, but once it's been marked with a "bullet" in the trade magazines, nothing short of a six-week power failure can prevent it from becoming a hit of some sort.

MURRAY McLAUCHLAN
ON TOUR '76
with the Silver Tractors

The Queen's Journal, Friday, February 4, 1977

Most songs are played on Top 40 because someone out there likes them. But how do the music directors know who likes what? The immediate answer is that the popularity of a song is based upon the sales of the single that it's pressed upon. Yet, my mind races back to the query raised by Flo and Eddie (formerly of the Turtles) about "Kung Fu Fighting" (the number one single in 1974): "If you didn't buy that song and I know I didn't buy that song, then who the hell bought that song?"

Who does buy 45's? I don't. At $1.25 each, they're not worth the music you get from them. Even when the prices were only $0.66 each, I rarely bought any because of their inconvenience. No sooner have you placed the needle on the vinyl and the song is over. The fact of the matter is that the population of those who buy singles is small in relation to those who buy albums. When is the last time you heard of a single "going platinum"? Yet it is these people who purchase 45 RPM discs who supposedly determine what is to be played on Top 40 radio stations. Each sale is a vote for the popularity of that song.

Most stations, whether they are Top 40 or not, have a playlist and chart of new singles. CFRC is no exception. While the station features most formats of music from classics to heavy rock, a chart and playlist has been set up in one particular field, Contemporary-MOR. Typically, we try to find new material that is enjoyable to the listeners and different from the material played on commercial stations in Kingston. The task is not always easy, however, because of the diversity of Top 40 music.

CFRC tries to be different in other ways, too. When the latest single by your favourite group is being talked-up, talked-down, talked-in-and-out, limited, compressed, and shoved at your ears once every two to four hours for several weeks, you either quickly retreat to the nearest classical or jazz library or become super-saturated from the record's abuse on the Top 40 stations. At Queensradio, any one song is rarely played more than once a day. Announcers are free to choose the music that they want to play, thus avoiding the dilemma of overplay.

Our Contemporary-MOR Chart is primarily based upon the popularity in sales and airplay of the corresponding album. When various cuts from Al Stewart's "Year of the Cat" album are being played often, the single release will climb up our chart. However, if the song is being overplayed on commercial stations, it usually loses its popularity at CFRC and soon drops off.

Both the chart and playlist provide a form of feedback to the record companies that supply us with the promotional material in the first place. This communication is essential for maintenance of a free-flowing life-line of new music. After all, these companies are contributing large sums of money toward this form of direct airplay promotion.

MacIntyres lead Gaels to 8-3 win in a battle of the cellar dwellers

by Tom Shand

The cellar dwellers of the eastern and central divisions met in a cross-town "battle" at Jock Hart's Arena on Tuesday night. However the game did not have that electric grudge-match atmosphere primarily because RMC is no better a hockey team than some of Queen's Bews teams. The end result was a rather tedious 8-3 victory for the Gaels.

The Redmen were never really in the game as not only do they have a dearth of talent but also lack any concept of organization. Gaels at times played down to this level but also showed some flashes of brilliance, particularly when the MacIntyres, Jed and Ned, teamed up with Terry Angel. This line was outstanding in its initial outing last Saturday against York and continued this performance against the Redmen. This time, their efforts were reflected on the scoreboard. Each scored a goal, and were in on six of Queen's total of eight. Jed, also known as John, was the leader with a goal and four assists including some of the prettiest scoring plays of the year. Brother Ned was only an assist behind.

Queen's first goal was scored with a Joe Pecaric wrist shot, with others going to Frank Coffey, Glenn Furgoch, Earl Moulton, and Kevin Treacy. Furgoch's scored from centre ice with five seconds left in the opening period following only eight seconds after Ned MacIntyre had given the Gaels a 4-1 lead.

Gaels outshot RMC 22 to 4 in the first period, 12 to 8 in the second, and 10 to 4 in the third for a three period total of 44 to 16.

Dave Hall scored two of RMC's three goals and assisted on the third by Jim Baldaro. This pair plus Eric Hay, Wayne Russell, and goaltender Rodger Hitsman were the most effective of the Redmen who are about as far removed from Queen's, in regards to talent, as the Gaels are from York.

So just remember when you come out to see the Gaels play their final home games this weekend that you haven't had it half as bad as our military friends across the bridge. Notes: Disco Joe Pecaric showed fine form in a one round K.O. over Jim Hessel in the final period Rookie goaltender Jeff Beck, in his second start of the season made some excellent saves for the Gaels while allowing only one "soft goal." Gaels play an exhibition match against MacMaster on Friday night and meet the Trent Nationals on Saturday night.

B.ballers have bad weekend

by Rob Bruce

The past week has been a trying one for our basketball Gaels. After surprising the country by beating 9th ranked York, and then swamping a weak R.M.C. team, the Gaels spirits were high as they cast their eyes to a possible playoff berth. Those spirits were soon dashed however, as the Queen's Squad braved the blizzard on Friday to travel to Toronto only to be defeated by an 80-48 score. On Thursday night, revenge was in the air but it was not to be as the Gee Gee's of Ottawa pulled out a hard fought 80-63 win. The two losses give the Gaels a 3-7 mark, well out of the play-off picture.

Talking to Pete Smith in his office after the two outings, the coach had no complaints about the Gaels performance. "Once these teams realized that we have a team that can beat a given team on any night, they had to get up for the game and play up to their potential." Coach Smith added that: "now these teams know that Queen's is in the league, and they have to play a good game."

That's exactly what the Blues did in Toronto Friday night, shooting 69 percent from the floor in the first half. "They weren't unguarded shots" said Coach Smith. "Our guys had their hands up in Toronto's faces, but the farther out we pushed them back, the farther out they shot from. Those guys just shoot with abandon, because they knew they had the big guys to get those rebounds if they missed." It was very physical as more than once the Queen's forwards were intimidated under the basket, not allowing Queen's to control Toronto's boards. McCready was the big shooter for the Gaels squad with 20 points, while Alps Bonniwell netted 8 and Cooney got 6.

Tuesday night in Ottawa wasn't much better, as once again the Gee

Gee's played a rough game under the basket. Though down by only 4 at the half, all it took was a couple of missed shots by the Gaels and a couple in for Ottawa to carry away the game in the second half. Godden played an outstanding game for the Gee Gee's netting 20 points, 12 rebounds and pretty well controlling both offensive and defensive boards. Again Coach Smith could in no way fault the Gaels team effort as "Max" Smart lead the effort with 15 points, Henry Garbaty netted 12 points and hauled down 14 rebounds. Other Queen's scorers were McCready with 13, and Cooney with 9.

This Friday night the Bartlett gymnasium is in for a real rouser, as RMC pays their respects in what is sure to be an exciting game. Tip-off is at 8:15 and if you can't make it there, it'll be broadcast on CFRC, 1499 in its entirety.

Nordic team battle Udora club

by Graham Wilkins

Any self-respecting nordic Ski Team would have spent the weekend gliding around the streets of Kingston. Here was a perfect opportunity to chuckle at those unfortunate souls who still hadn't realized that ski is a must in a city that has decided to wait until the snow melts rather than wasting money on snow removal costs. Yet Saturday morning found our (fool) hardy team heading for the Udora ski club trying not to become vehicle number 135 to make an 'unplanned stop' along the 401 to Toronto.

The Udora Ski Club, 45 miles north-east of Toronto, is a small and friendly club that takes great pride in its Finnish traditions. Our hosts were very understanding when we failed to say even 'hello' properly and they calmly suffered, as we insisted on finding new ways to mispronounce their names. Club races allow university skiers, for the trifling price of a little humiliation, to come in contact with the more experienced skiers in Ontario. Club racers, in turn, are generally willing to cooperate by offering helpful words of advice and solace as, all too effortlessly, they approach, pass, and disappear in the distance.

Queen's skiers still managed to finish high among other university skiers representing U. of T., Guelph and Laurentian. Deryck Evans finished fourth, just out of the prizes but ahead of other university skiers, in the 16 km. event on Saturday. Sunday afternoon in the 44km relay, the Queen's No. 1 team of Evans, G. Srecky, R. McIntosh and G. McLelland finished fifth overall and second among the university teams. Queen's No. 2 team of P. Ostrom, H. Wasterneys, G. Wilkins and K. Crawford provided Queen's with 'depth' by handling the second teams from the other universities and finishing ninth overall. The Sunday morning 8km. event forced the Queen's team to fall back on some of the classic 'explanations'. Drifting snow, high winds, bad wax and bitter cold were other ways of saying too slow.

Coach 'hamburg-Pete' Kopp, between repeated Big Mac attacks, reassured team members that they had made a strong showing against the perennial powers of university skiing U. of T. and Guelph. In fact, if he could find a way to misspell our names so that they sounded more Scandinavian and less Anglo-Saxon, he insisted our team might even be considered a strong contender for the OUAA finals. The team looks forward to another chance to ski against club racers at Camp Fortune in Ottawa on February 5 and 6, and then on February 12, Queen's will host its invitational race at Knowlton Lake. There seems to be plenty of time to learn how to say 'track' in Norwegian or German before the University finals in Midland on February 19 and 20.

Despite gals optimism . . .

B.ball bombout

by Tom Shand

Unfortunately for the Gals basketball team history has a habit of repeating itself at all the wrong times. The girls from Queen's moved into Ottawa on Tuesday night fully confident that they could defeat the hometown Gee Gees. Their confidence spawned from the fact that despite an earlier loss to Ottawa here at Queen's, they knew that they had outplayed them on that occasion and could do it again. This they did but once again they came out on the bottom end of the score.

Ottawa only lost the lead once during the entire game and emerged with a 59 to 53 victory. The loss leaves the Gals with a record of 6 wins and 5 losses while Ottawa now has 10 victories to their credit as opposed to only 2 defeats. The two teams are now second and third in their division behind Laurentian.

The Gee Gees victory can largely be attributed to their much higher shooting percentage from the floor combined with an overwhelming number of turnovers by the Gals. The Gals were also hurt badly when their big girl, Kim Headford, fouled out of the game with over seven minutes left to play. Donna Roman picked up some of the scoring slack as she led the Gals with 16 points while Deb Moore did her best to control the boards. However in the final analysis this was not enough as the final score indicated. Once again a good effort nullified by too many mistakes.

Golden Grapplers to invade R.M.C.

This Saturday, Queen's wrestling fans will have their last chance to see the Golden Grapplers in action. On Saturday, February 5, the Gaels intend to invade the compounds of R.M.C. to show the Cadets a thing or two about wrestling. The tournament will actually be a tri-meet. The Grapplers and the Cadets will be joined by a contingent from C.M.R. of St. Jean, Quebec. The wrestling will start at 1:00 p.m. (13:00 hrs.) in the new phys. ed. complex. A bevy of wrestling fans would be greatly appreciated.

This year the Golden Grapplers have come on very strong. Jim Muller has picked up a first place in the R.M.C. Open and a second at our very own Queen's Open. Other wrestlers who have done well this year are Mike Moggridge, Chris Faralle, John Vooy, Chris Thomas and Rick Turton as well as Del DelMonte and Ron "Crash" Craddock. Due to circumstances beyond our control, "Crash" will not be competing this weekend. It is, however, hoped that all of his fans will turn out to cheer the rest of the Gaels on to victory.

For this meet the Gaels will be fortified by the season's debut of two additional wrestlers. At heavyweight, Murray Buchanan of the football team will be out to show those military boys some of the wrestling which he most skillfully acquired in high school. After just a few practices, coach Roy Worthington optimistically said that Murray could win the O.U.A.A. Championships. With an intensive upgrading course from Roy, Murray should be very tough to defeat. The other new face is a returning veteran, Alex "Kid Faz" Faseruk. Alex, who is well above his usual 167-pound weight class, will be competing in the 190-pound class.

The Gaels will probably win the tri-meet. This year they have an exceptionally strong team. Although R.M.C. and C.M.R. have a few outstanding wrestlers, they nevertheless lack the depth which the Queen's team possesses. The Gaels are now looking forward to the O.U.A.A. Championships to be held February 18 and 19 in Waterloo.

Put the fun back in Saturday night hockey

Mother's Guide to the NHL

by Frank Pagnucco

Most people in their early twenties can remember the days when the Saturday night represented the single most important form of entertainment for the average Canadian family. The National Hockey League's expansion in 1968 and subsequent years did much to downplay hockey's hallowed status in homes across the nation. In an effort to eradicate the problem of poor fan support and the bankruptcy that accompanies it the club owners put their heads together. Though the bigwigs of professional could not reach a consensus they came up with ideas on further expansion, equalization grants, equalization drafts and, yes, even merger with the 'other' hockey league. They seem to be needlessly complicating the issue.

A better way of bringing people back to the T.V. sets and the arenas would be to re-introduce them to professional hockey. In order to ensure the best results such a program should be aimed at the very nucleus of the nuclear family, the mother. It is imperative for the N.H.L. to recapture the interest of Canadian mothers. It was mothers that made Saturday night hockey fun. For instance, what would have been the point in arguing about hockey with your father or your brother if you knew your mother wouldn't be there to break it up. What point would there have been in cheering for a particular team if you knew your mother wouldn't be there to console you when they lost. What thrill would there have been to overtime hockey if sudden death didn't mean mother deciding it was time for bed before the winning goal was scored. Mothers should be introduced to the behemoth that is now the N.H.L. by a guide that outlines each team in terms of its most outstanding characteristics. It should sound something like this.

Welcome back to the N.H.L. mothers in Canada and the United States. Here is your guide to the N.H.L. as it is today. If the team wears red, has a lot of French speaking players and is usually winning, it is the Montreal Canadiens (SEE, things haven't changed that much after all). If the team is wearing red sweaters (like Gordie Howe used to wear), has a lot of English speaking players and loses with monotonous regularity, it is the Detroit Red Wings. If the team wears blue, has a lot of Swedish speaking players and is owned by a man who looks to be the quintessence of the reformed criminal, it is the Toronto Maple Leafs. If the team wears orange, plays hockey in a slightly rougher fashion and is coached by a man who looks like he might be a Russian, then it is the Philadelphia Flyers (careful here mothers, the fights you see on the screen might spread into your living room). If the team is wearing red and black (like Bobby Hull used to wear before the bad guys lured him away) and plays well only when a man with sore knees wearing number four is on the ice, it is the Chicago Blackhawks (they were in the playoffs last time you watched a hockey game). If the team sports a big 'A' on its sweater and has a lot of Canadian players who, by selling tickets to their own games, have learned how to speak in a southern drawl, it is the Atlanta Flames. If the team has sweaters with a buffalo imprinted on them, plays something like the Montreal Canadians only with less consistency and is managed by an ex-Toronto coach with a penchant for drafting Japanese hockey players, it is the Buffalo Sabres. If the team sports yellow and black and plays its best hockey in front of an empty arena

(Chicago's number four used to play with them when his knees were O.K. and when they used to have fan support). If the team sweaters are red, blue and white, has a few players that you think you might have seen playing for Boston and who seem to be slightly over-weight, it is the New York Rangers. If the team is from New York and is winning it is the Islanders. Though there are several other teams left they seem to defy description. They are Pittsburgh, Los Angeles, Colorado, Cleveland, Vancouver, Minnesota and Washington. No one knows from week to week whether these franchises will survive. No one really cares. For the sake of preserving your appreciation for the fine calibre of hockey you have come to expect from the N.H.L. we recommend that you turn off the T.V. set whenever one of these teams plays. Aside from this you should have a thoroughly enjoyable evening watching hockey. Welcome back to Saturday night Hockey!

So much for the guide. I guess you were right Ma, the N.H.L. just ain't what she used to be. Saturday night hockey will have to wait for a few more years.

★ ★ ★ BEWS' STARS ★ ★ ★

by Mike Gouinlock

As the Bews season enters into its final five weeks, perhaps the time is right to recognize the work done by a few persons in the intramural system which has gone unnoticed and unappreciated over the year. This is the final year at Queen's for four people who have been instrumental in the organization and running of Bews, not only this year, but over the past four years.

Steve Pritchard, this year's M.I.M.A.C. vice-chairman, Arts faculty stick and PHE athletic stick of 1975-76, graduates this year. During the past four years Steve could invariably be found refereeing, re-organizing schedules as a convenor, or playing for one of PHE's many championship teams. An extremely hard worker, Steve serves on several M.I.M.A.C. committees.

John "Woos" Woollatt finishes fourth-year Economics this year. Since last year, John has been one of the driving forces behind Arts '77, and last year as athletic stick led the year to a record number of championships and a third place finish in the overall Bews standings. He has played on several championship teams, won two free-throw championships himself and was voted the outstanding freshman Arts athlete in 1974.

Last year's M.I.M.A.C. chairman Paul Findlay graduates this year from Queen's law school. Paul has been the driving force behind Law 77 and the Law faculty's participation in the intramural program over the past three years. He has participated in almost every sport offered in the program and has anchored the powerful Law 77 bowling squad which is favoured again this year to win its third consecutive title. Paul worked as the Bews publicity convenor for two years and it is through some of his work that there has been greater variety and participation in the program. Paul does not only limit his work to Law 77. He is presently organizing the province-wide intramural Law Hockey and Basketball Tournament to be held at Queen's on March 11 and 12.

Probably the hardest working and most dedicated individual in all of Bews the past four years has been Ross Fraser. He has been Commerce 77's athletic stick for four years, Commerce faculty stick for the last two years and M.I.M.A.C. chairman for 1976-77. Ross is a member of several intramural committees yet still finds time to play a great number of sports including intercollegiate squash. Ross is presently organizing the Commerce intramural tournament and more recently coached the Commerce team at Queen's to victory in the Commerce Cup.

This article is by no means an attempt to eulogize these people, but instead a sincere gesture of appreciation for their hours and hours of hard work over the past few years. These are the people who make the intramural system go. To the majority of people their work goes unnoticed. It should not.

End to controls?

Finance Minister Donald MacDonald spoke with provincial finance ministers on Tuesday, and seemed in favor of gradually phasing out wage and price controls. Although he was not definite in saying when controls would end, Mr. MacDonald outlined government plans for loosening controls and various post-control arrangements. He favored the foundation of an agency, to succeed the Anti-Inflation Board, which would monitor and comment on wage and price increases after controls were dropped. Many of the provinces seemed agreeable with the proposed idea of a watchdog agency.

Ontario Treasurer Darcy McKeough wants an immediate end on all controls of profits. Mr. MacDonald wants to drop all controls gradually, since the economy is still "quite fragile." However Mr.

MacDonald said that "the sooner the economy can be decontrolled and the timetable for decontrol can be announced, the more likely it is that business investment will follow its traditional pattern and that economic growth will be maintained at a reasonable rate."

Several ways to end controls were mentioned by Mr. MacDonald. The possibilities include: ending controls on a certain date, taking controls off gradually by raising the size limit of controlled firms, or taking controls off certain industries first and others later. The method of decontrol favored by Mr. MacDonald would have controlled groups released from controls as their contracts expire, and removing price and profit controls at the end of a company's fiscal year.

Rhodesian students

The fate of the 400 Rhodesian students who crossed the Rhodesian border into Botswana Sunday is still undecided. Botswana maintains that the students were fleeing Rhodesian military harassment. Rhodesia claims that the 230 boys and 170 girls, aged between 11 and 21, were seized at gunpoint by guerrillas recruiting for their war against the white government.

Botswana's President said that he firmly believed the students had fled from Rhodesian military forces who, according to refugees, "shoot innocent people to maintain a killing quota of ten (guerrillas) to one (Rhodesian soldier)." Rhodesian Foreign Minister, Pieter Van der Byl, said the Red Cross had agreed to a Rhodesian request to intervene "on behalf of the victims."

Nuclear power

The outgoing president of the International Energy Agency said yesterday that the use of nuclear power must increase to meet future energy needs, despite public concern over safety.

Viscount Etienne Davignon is stepping down to join the European Common Market Commission. He is succeeded by German secretary of state for economics, Detlev Rohwedder.

Viscount Davignon said that Saudi Arabia has started producing more than its announced ceiling of petroleum and feels that the trend is continuing. He also said that intensive research and development into alternative energy sources must continue, but in the short-term, nuclear power is the only answer.

Reviewing the organization's first three years, Viscount Davignon said oil stocks in member nations of the IEA had been increased, and the agency had a "crisis plan in place, working and credible," in the event of a new embargo "of which there is no sign".

Heat St. Lawrence

The U.S. has made a rather startling proposal; to keep the St. Lawrence river and the Great Lakes open for navigation twelve months a year.

Several methods can be considered. Twinning seaway locks, vast dredging of the river bottom, ice booms, and a major ice-breaking program are potential methods, but the most probable would be to use thermal effluent from nuclear plants to warm and melt the ice.

Canadian officials are worried. New nuclear power plants would be located at Ogdensburg, Iroquois, Cornwall Island and Beaugarnois Canal in Quebec. The dangers are obvious. The heat effluent would be mere pollution in the summer, and no one quite knows what the results for the aquatic fish and plant life would be.

Biologists will be investigating the problem, but a big push can be expected from American organizations who stand to gain immense financial benefits from this ice-clearance.

Bilingualism

A study group of the Department of Transport has decided that it would be safe to implement bilingual air traffic control for light planes using Mirabel and St. Hubert airports in Montreal.

The Ambassador . . .
Tuesday night Thomas Enders stated that "It is not in our interest to get involved in Canada."

U.S. won't interfere in Quebec Ambassador says, hecklers jeer

by Rob Reynolds

American ambassador to Canada, Thomas Enders, at Queen's Tuesday night, asserted "the United States does not carry out intelligence activities in Canada," and "this can be said in reference to very few nations."

In replying to a question on Quebec, Enders stated that, "there is not an American plan for the invasion of Quebec. These are internal Canadian matters." The American ambassador said "Canada is a democracy," causing one member of the audience to interject, "Was Chile a democracy?"

This exchange was precipitated by a member of the audience who read a document which made mention of alleged U.S. intelligence operation in Quebec, referred to as "Project Camelot."

The reader later called attention to the fact that Enders was responsible for targeting the daily B-52 bombings of Cambodia during the spring and summer of 1973. The ambassador was called a "war criminal" and asked "Why the American government chose a person with your nefarious background to be ambassador to Canada."

Responding, Enders called the South-East Asian conflict "A nightmare within the United States and within Vietnam. This is not a period of American history that will be looked back on with pride."

When the American ambassador was later asked about the legality of the Cambodian bombing in light of the Chase-Church amendment in the United States Senate prohibiting such acts of aggression, Mr. Enders replied that the question "was not germane to the issue of Canadian-American relations" which was the subject of his comments.

CANADIAN BUY BACK

In his speech before the crowded Dunning Hall audience, Enders alluded to historic levels of American investment in Canada stating, "Maybe the classical position of the United States and Canada is beginning to change." The ambassador noted that Canada, "solicited American investment during the thirties, forties and fifties." Then there were the "beginnings of the Canadian buy-back."

This Canadian trend, according to Enders, occurred at the same time as, "the views of Americans on the export of capital began to change." Later, during the question period,

Enders hinted that it may be in the best interests of Canadians to encourage foreign investment because since Canada has discouraged this investment there have been, "fewer jobs and higher unemployment."

Putting the issue in a global perspective the ambassador claimed that, "All of our societies are going to

however, certain members of the crowd asked the ambassador whether American involvement was in Cambodia's best interest.

Against the foreign fees

In an effort to reverse the decision taken by Queen's students in a referendum last fall, some students like Bill Burgess and Susan Stewart, above, took time to distribute anti-foreign differential tuition fee material in Mackintosh-Corry Hall this week.

Who Won?

Terry Collins & Denis Champagne
The students of Queen's reaffirmed their agreement with the Ontario Government's policy of differential tuition fees for foreign students and rejected membership in the National Union of Students in a referendum conducted Wednesday and Thursday.

Students voted 1,386 'yes' to 1,551 'no' on the question of foreign student fees. A 'no' vote registered agreement with the government's policy.

NUS membership was rejected by 29 votes with 1,404 voting in favor and 1,437 against.

On the other referendum questions, Bus-it will be continued next year at a cost of $5.85, up 50 cents from this year, and legal aid will be allowed to keep its 75 cents per student levy. Bus-it was passed 2,062 to 877, legal aid 2,552 to 300. The total number of ballots cast in the referendum was 2,939 or roughly 30 per cent of the student body.

In the faculty society elections the following results were obtained.

In ASUS: 1 year ASUS rep to AMS Outer Council, Bartlett 633, (elected), Evans 145, Finley 393, (elected), Friesen 264, Hinton 377 (elected), Morton 244, Olchowik 340, Ryder-Burbridge 250, Underhill 288, Vernon 393 (elected), Welch 268, Wighey 316.

For 2 years ASUS rep to AMS Outer Council; Brisbin, 258, Francis 168, Evans 345 (elected), Fennell 337 (elected), Ng 320.

Mike MacMillan won the position of one-year ASUS senator with 538 votes, defeating Sarah Edinborough and Dymna Doucette, who received 457 and 113 votes respectively.

For two-year ASUS senator the results were: Gord Howe 447 (elected), Balfour 318, Fay 121 and Helling 91.

Jacqueline Hall won ASUS treasurer over Joan Fosmire, 531 to 256. Debbie Churchill is the new ASUS secretary. She defeated Deb McGuire 470 to 420.

Cathy Spoel and Tom Box were acclaimed president and vice president of ASUS respectively.

In Engineering the results were as follows: President, Steve Chapman and vice president Steve Greey (acclaimed).

For faculty board reps: Duchenko 344 (elected), Kowalczyzyn 298 (elected), Mills 346 (elected), Stewart 353 (elected), Tinari 259.

Steven Hubert defeated Colin Cantlie, 326 to 156, for Eng. Soc. secretary.

David Anthony was acclaimed development co-ordinator, Charlie Lund acclaimed treasurer and Joe Timmins Engineering Senator.

Commerce Election results were not available this morning but will be published Tuesday, pending notification of the candidates. Commerce students decided to increase their faculty society fee by $4 to $11.50 (effective next academic year) by a vote of 293 to 96.

Faculty Society turnouts were: 26.5 percent, 33 percent, and 49 percent, for ASUS, Engineering and Commerce, respectively.

Bully tactics

A thirteen-member, all-party investigative committee of the federal government arrived in Kingston Tuesday. The committee is responding to information received in Ottawa Monday concerning the practices of a small group of Millhaven Penitentiary staff members who are said to employ "bully tactics" against inmates and fellow staff members.

The staff members in question are apparently using intimidation as a weapon against their colleagues in order to obtain special considerations and are goading prisoners into violent reactions in order to underline their wishes. The Regional Director of Penitentiaries, Mr. Trono, stated that Millhaven is the most efficient prison in the country for the control of inmates. He may however be forced to bow to the demands of certain staff members who threaten to refuse to work overtime.

Stories are presently circulating at Millhaven of beatings, smashings, tire-slashings and of more subtle techniques such as leaving windows in empty cells open on cold days to 'cool down' the temperature in a separation range.

The problem is not aided by the Public Service Alliance of Canada, under whose auspices, the prison guards, as members, are protected from dismissal. The regional vice-president of the union himself admitted to being harassed by prison guards who disagreed with the position he took on a contract dispute.

Safe in custody?

The penitentiary subcommittee on prisons which came to Kingston at the beginning of this week visited the Kingston Penitentiary on Tuesday and concluded that the protective custody range located at the regional reception centre could be headed towards serious problems.

This protective custody range only holds 22 inmates at the moment, but it is inadequately heated, only cold water is available, it has inadequate education and recreation programs and the security is poor.

Inmates from both the general prison population and from the protective custody range itself recommended the building of a special institution specifically for inmates needing protection. Such prisoners can be sexual offenders, or have seen prison murders or beatings.

The inmates of this protective custody range claim that their food, prepared by members of the general prison population, often contains "pills" or other foreign substances. They would like to be separated from the rest of the prison by bars, not by "chicken-wire", since they are afraid the range might be stormed during a riot.

Stranded

Very bad weather forced the Howe Island ferry to stop operations Thursday, January 27, and as of last Wednesday service was still at a halt. The "worst problem for the Howe Island residents was their depleted fuel stocks. Several houses had no fuel left, and many were close to the bottom of their supplies.

But last Tuesday about seventy army officers and men started across the solidly-frozen Bateau Channel - seven miles to the east of Kingston, and brought hundreds of jerrycans of oil to the residents on military toboggans towed by privately-owned snowmobiles.

The military will continue the service if necessary until the ferry resumes operations.

Full-up

The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has run a survey in Kingston which shows that last October the apartment vacancy rate was .3 percent, well under the average rate for Ontario of 1.5 percent. The survey was only based on buildings with six or more apartments.

Kingston housing tends to cater for middle and upper-middle income groups and not for those who most desperately need accommodation:

low-income families, senior citizens with fixed incomes, physically handicapped persons, mothers raising families on welfare.

As of August only seventeen units in Kingston designed for handicapped people were in use. All are situated in senior citizens complexes, which hardly seems a fair solution for the handicapped.

Single mothers on welfare also face a difficult problem in a search for decent but cheap lodgings. Some have been attacked by a landlord or have had their children harassed. Also landlords often do not approve of larger families, who tend, they claim, to ruin the apartment, or of welfare recipients who are often accused of carelessness.

Odds and ends

River Products Inc. of Iowa gave an employee a safety award and bolted it to his hard hat. A while later the employee was driving a company truck and hit an overpass. The bolt in his hard hat struck him, injured him, and now he has a $10,000 suit filed against this employer.

In North Carolina an exciting basketball game took place. The end score was 2-0 and the radio play-by-play commentator was totally exhausted after having interviewed everyone even faintly interesting to fill in the playing time report.

Class boycotts called

TORONTO [CUP] — Students at six Ontario campuses have rejected by a 2 to 1 margin the provincial government's tuition fee hike for next year and have called for a boycott of classes to protest the hike, according to the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS).

As of Feb. 3 students at the universities of McMaster, Lakehead and Carleton, the colleges of Humber and Fanshawe and Ryerson Polytechnical Institute approved in referenda an OFS call for a half-day class moratorium to support demands for a fee rollback and a government promise that fees will not be raised again, said OFS staff member Rick Gregory.

Feb. 10 was the day originally set for a province-wide boycott, but many campuses now have planned events on different days, reports indicate.

A half-day moratorium on classes along with a publicity campaign aimed at getting support from outside the student community for the fight against the hike was the strategy agreed to by student leaders at a special OFS meeting Jan. 15.

In a recent statement Carleton University student president and OFS executive member Scott Mullin said the Ontario government's response to the report, which recommended a 65 per cent tuition fee hike, indicates tuition will continue to rise in the coming years.

At Queen's, a mass meeting on the subject was to have taken place last week. It was postponed because of the referendum and elections. The meeting will be held in the near future. Depending on the interest shown at the meeting, a class boycott may be called.

New pub hours

The Underground will be expanding their hours of operation.

Commencing Monday, February 14, 1977, the pub will open at the usual hour, 8:00pm, and will service last call one half hour later at 12:30. This will be the practise on all Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday evenings. On Friday and Saturday evenings, however, the pub will open its doors one hour earlier, at 7:00 pm, and will service last call at 12:30am. Friday afternoons will remain unchanged, with the doors opening at 12:00 noon and with last call at 5:00 pm.

According to Gord Mettam, assistant pub manager, with reference to opening the pub one hour earlier, the decision was taken in response to what was felt to be a general feeling that "the pub ought to be open more often." The move is also expected to help mitigate the long line-ups.

Psychics fizzle

SAN FRANCISCO [ZNS-CUP] — A study conducted at Harvard University has found that 10 leading psychics were no better at predicting the future than were ordinary, randomly-selected college students.

Professor Gary Fine, writing in the new magazine The Zetetic, reports on a survey comparing the accuracy of predictions for the year 1973 by 10 established American psychics with predictions made by 10 Harvard and Radcliffe undergraduates. Neither group was particularly accurate, Fine says.

The psychics and the students were both correct and incorrect about the same number of times — with the students being, if anything, "marginally more accurate", according to the University of Minnesota professor.

Enders

Enders then asked the rhetorical question, "Where is the capital formation going to come from?"

Historically, Enders noted the special relationship that was established between the two nations by Franklin Roosevelt and W.L. Mackenzie King during the Second World War. According to Enders, "Mr. King's objective was to obtain for Canada some freedom of movement from Great Britain" and that Roosevelt's objective was to make the U.S. "a leader in the Western Hemisphere and perhaps the world."

In referring to the American domestic scene, Enders asserted that, "It is a period of relative good feeling that the Carter administration starts out on." He remarked that the Carter administration is overly concerned with improving relations with Canada.

Protesters picketed Dunning Hall prior to the speech with placards denouncing Enders as an "imperialist" and a "mass murderer." One placard bore the inscription that "Enders' hands are red" in reference to Enders' involvement in the Cambodian situation.

As Enders began his speech one protester escorted a masked individual, cloaked in black to the front of the auditorium. The person wore a sign which read, "Remember Cambodia."

Queen's Entertainment Agency good, but . . .

Kingston fails to draw performers

by Tim Greenwood

"Kingston is a secondary market and managers would often rather have their groups rest than play here." This statement was made by Queen's Entertainment Agency (QEA) director Granville Gibbons at the last meeting of Outer Council, in reply to a letter submitted by AMS representative Kit Spence.

In his letter Mr. Spence questioned whether the services the QEA provides were valuable enough to justify its continued existence and the three dollar concert fee which is part of the student interest fee. (Students have the choice to opt out of this payment.) He suggested that professionals might do a better job and also asked for particulars about the QEA questionnaire which was distributed in order to learn Queen's students' musical tastes.

Mr. Gibbons told the Outer Council that a professional would probably have as much difficulty as himself in attracting performers to what they consider "a hick town." He said that groups will often ignore Kingston even if they are playing in Toronto or Montreal since a stopover at Queen's would do little to boost their record sales or improve their popularity on the charts.

In a letter written by the QEA in response to Mr. Spence's question it was stated that the QEA questionnaire was distributed randomly around the campus and that it "was conceived to give us (the QEA) an idea of the type of music people were most interested in hearing at Queen's. It was not the basis of our booking this year."

In an interview with the Journal, Mr. Gibbons said that despite the difficulties inherent in being situated in Kingston he believes that the QEA is one of the very best organizations of its kind in Canada. He remarked that Queen's obtained a "better selection" of groups than other universities and that what the QEA considers to be a "big concert" would be regarded as a "giant concert" by other schools. He felt that the upcoming Carlos Santana in March was a good example of the kind of talent the QEA could bring to Kingston.

MANAGER LAUGHED

Explaining some of the specific problems he has had in trying to bring performers to Kingston Mr. Gibbons said that Gino Vanelli's manager laughed at him over the phone when he tried to get Vanelli at Queen's. The manager later offered the QEA Gino Vanelli at his regular price with a band he had never sung with before, and as it would have little more than a rehearsal at Queen's expense, Mr. Gibbons declined.

Moreover, Mr. Gibbons said that $20,000 was not enough to attract Gordon Lightfoot, and that the Electric Light Orchestra decided not to play in Kingston in between Toronto and Montreal engagements because they did not feel it was worthwhile. Mr. Gibbons stated that months of negotiations are often required, and it is sometimes necessary to offer performers more than they are worth. He said that the QEA set up about six dates by block booking at different universities to try to entice Rick Wakeman to Queen's on a North American tour, yet he decided to stay in England. Mr. Gibbons has been negotiating with Todd Rundgren, yet the arena is booked on the only dates he is available. Gibbons does not feel that Rundgren is a big enough draw to justify renting the Memorial Centre for an off-campus concert.

"PROFESSIONAL SNOBBERY" Mr. Gibbons said that the QEA occasionally suffers from "professional snobbery." He believes that his fifteen member crew and their assistants can set up and run a concert as well as any professionals, yet Bruce Springsteen is not coming to Queen's because his manager insisted on dealing with a professional booking agent. Mr. Gibbons said that he did not imagine any professional would be foolish enough to promote Springsteen in Kingston because of the difficulties involved.

He noted that many students do not realize that the QEA is responsible for more than just bringing concerts to Queen's. They are kept busy providing entertainment for the pub and at social functions around the campus as well, he said.

Cops abuse powers

by Paul Finkel

People in our society "are too willing to bow to authority" and thus "police generally abuse their powers." This point along with many others was made by Mr. Paul Pakenham (Law 78) speaking to a small audience on the police powers of arrest, search and seizure, last Wednesday evening.

Mr. Pakenham explained that police powers of arrest are "extremely broad" and do not require a warrant, or actual observation of a crime while a citizen's power of arrest is "somewhat limited" because they must see an individual commit an offense. He added that a citizen on the street certain of their innocence, should say nothing if asked by an officer to stop and answer questions or try to avoid stopping by claiming to be in a rush or going to an appointment.

If arrested it is advisable to "exercise your right to keep silent" and "insist" on legal council because there is no suppression of evidence in Canadian Law and anything, tangible or verbal, even if obtained illegally may be used against you.

"USE FORCE"

Calling skin searches for narcotics "rather offensive", Mr. Pakenham stated that these searches do not have to be made by an officer of the same sex as the citizen. He continued to say that a person certain of their innocence is legally entitled to use "as much force as necessary" to resist such a search. In such cases he advised that the citizen have a witness and be absolutely certain that the police had no "reasonable or probable grounds" (which includes evidence obtained from wire-taps) for the search. In a case where an officer has conducted a search without due cause he can be charged with assault and battery.

Mr. Pakenham elaborated on the "Writ of Assistance" (terming it similar to a "Lettre de Cachet") and Warrant. Officers of the law "can do anything" when searching a dwelling for narcotics under a Writ of Assistance which includes searching in walls and plumbing, and are not responsible for any property damage incurred during the search because they are acting under the law. He also said that police do not need to show a warrant or Writ of Assistance before conducting a search and have the power to enter a dwelling unannounced.

Object to Search

Commenting on signs in stores claiming the right to search shoppers or their bags before they leave, Mr. Pakenham declared that a clerk or store detective has no more power than the ordinary citizen. Thus they can only search a person if they suspect or have actually seen them steal something. If innocent, a citizen can refuse to consent and can press charges if they are searched or detained against their will.

When asked if such rules also applied to AMS constables' right to search patrons leaving the pub, Mr. Pakenham replied in the affirmative and suggested that "normal legal remedies are open to you", if you feel you have been searched without due cause.

Claude Ryan returns

Outspoken editor of Le Devoir, Claude Ryan, will be the 1977 speaker at the traditional baccalaureate service at Queen's University, Sunday, March 6 at 11:30am in Grant Hall.

While Mr. Ryan strongly believes in a dignified place for Quebec in Confederation, he has never been a supporter of special status for Quebec or separatism.
